Naming Hampden-Sydney College as your IRA beneficiary may increase the total value of the assets passing to your heirs.

Win-Win!

By W. Birch Douglass III '65

THE MOST IMPORTANT ESTATE planning decision you can make about your Individual Retirement Account (IRA) is the beneficiary designation with respect to IRA funds remaining at your death. This selection involves more than merely directing the assets to certain individuals or organizations after your death, and it may have a serious impact on your entire estate plan. Your IRA beneficiary designation may affect the amount of estate and income taxes, plus probate and other related costs, that will have to be paid with respect to your IRA and, as a result, the total value of assets actually realized by your family or other chosen beneficiaries.

Retirement assets are quickly becoming one of the biggest sources of wealth for many people. Naming a charitable organization such as Hampden-Sydney College as the beneficiary of all or a portion of your IRA will reduce the amount of estate and income taxes.

Retirement assets are quickly becoming one of the biggest sources of wealth for many people. These assets include IRA's, as well as pension plans, profit sharing plans, 401(k) plans, and 403 (b) plans. At the owner's death, these assets are considered to be "income in respect of a decedent" (IRD) because income taxes have been deferred. These IRD assets are subject to income taxes in the hands of the recipients, in addition to possible estate taxes. Although the beneficiary will be entitled to an income tax deduction for the amount of estate tax paid on this IRD asset, the ovetall tax bite could result in the loss of up to 75% of the value of the asset.

However, naming a charitable organization such as Hampden-Sydney College as the beneficiary of all or a portion of your IRA, instead of leaving some other asset to the College, will reduce the amount of estate and income taxes, as well as othet costs, otherwise payable at your death. As a result, the total value of the estate available for distribution to your family or other estate beneficiaries may be increased. Your charitable gift may result in increased benefits for everyone but Uncle Sam.

By naming a charitable organization such as Hampden-Sydney College as the beneficiary of all ot a portion of your IRA, you will avoid having estate and income taxes being paid on such funds. Although the value of the IRA will still be included in your estate, your estate will receive an offsetting charitable estate tax deduction. Additionally, as Hampden-Sydney College is a tax-exempt organization, the College does not pay income taxes on the IRA benefits it receives. The corresponding reduction in overall estate taxes realized by giving an IRA to charity can result in a larger amount of your remaining estate being preserved. Targeting other assets that may pass tax free, such as life insurance owned by irrevocable trusts, to your family or other beneficiaries can increase the tax benefits of this planning device.

As a result of new tax regulations dealing with the payout of retirement assets, naming a charitable organization such as Hampden-Sydney College as the beneficiary of all or a part of your IRA will no longer result in larger required minimum distributions from the IRA during your lifetime. These regulations allow most IRA owners to use a Uniform Distribution Table to compute their required minimum distributions, regardless of the identity of the named beneficiary. (There is an exception for a beneficiary spouse more than ten years younger than the IRA owner, which results in an even more favorable calculation of minimum distribution requirements). Naming a charitable organization as the beneficiary of all or a portion of your IRA does require full distribution of the charitable share of the IRA to the charity by the end of the year after the year of your death; however, there is no negative tax burden for the charity as a result of this immediate distribution. Unlike a situation involving a family member who would benefit from being able to spread the payments (and corresponding tax liability) over a number of years, the charitable organization will benefit from the more immediate payout of the charitable portion of the IRA.

Young Hampden-Sydney College alumni hit the campaign trail, wielding power as consultants and party operatives

"In My Blood"

By Peter Davies

MOST PEOPLE WOULD NOT consider Hampden-Sydney College an activist campus. Students do not storm the President's office demanding better wages for custodians. They do not inspect the bookstore's t-shirts for signs of child labor abuses. Loud, public demonstrations are not the way of the Hampden-Sydney gentleman.

Behind the scenes, however, an increasing number of alumni are becoming professional political activists. They can be found throughout Virginia politics, as well as in many other states and at the national level. Unlike members of previous generations, younger alumni are quite content to remain behind the scenes, working as political consultants and party directors. They realize one does not necessarily have to be a politician to exert considerable political influence. In our highly professionalized political culture, some operatives, such as the sparring spouses James Carville and Mary Matalin, can become as famous as their clients. Politicians, from the national level on down to state senate races, rely on professional campaigners to package their message for easy consumption.

While some may decry this trend as a distortion of democracy, especially when held against the nostalgically pure notion of men like Lincoln and Douglas debating from atop actual stumps, it is instructive to hear the stories of those who now find themselves on the inside of our political culture. While they deal daily with the compromises of political life, all four of our subjects cling to an idealism, borne in several cases out of their Hampden-Sydney experience, about our democracy and its enduring possibilities.

AT THE 1992 DEMOCRATIC National Convention, Rod O'Connor '92 walked up to the podium after the TV cameras were turned off and most of the delegates had gone home. As he stood there, facing the cavernous convention hall, he thought, "Wow, I'm a part of this." At the time, right after graduation, O'Connor was just an entry-level staffer in the office of Al Gore, the junior senator from Tennessee. Three weeks later, he was working for a vice-presidential candidate at the national convention. But this was just the start of his political career.

Eight years after sneaking up to the podium after hours, O'Connor was picked to run the entire Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles. As Chief Operating Officer for the convention, he was responsible for a $48 million budget and for coordinating the logistics of 50,000 visitors (including 15,000 journalists). Instead of being a mere interloper at the podium, he was involved in the serious discussions of who stood at the podium during prime time.

Beginning in September of 1999, O'Connor worked in Los Angeles to organize the convention. In addition to raising nearly $25 million dollars, he coordinated the event with the local host committee and with the complicated array of security forces involved. Not surprisingly, for someone so invested in it, he defends party conventions from recent suggestions that they have outlived their usefulness. While they may no longer have the drama of Chicago 1968, he believes that, "the convention still provides a time for you to be able to hear directly from the candidates, without going through the media filter or the sound bites of electoral politics. There aren't many times during the election cycle when you get to sit there and listen and say 'I agree' or 'I don't agree' with that."

In response to shrinking network coverage (it went from 19.8 hours of prime time in 1996 to just under 14 hours this year), O'Connor turned to other outlets. "We built our own TV, radio, and internet studio for the convention," he said. In addition to the gavel-to-gavel coverage provided on cable channels, the convention was streamed live on the internet. To O'Connor, the loss in network coverage is not necessarily symptomatic of a declining interest in party conventions; it reflects the fact that networks in general are losing audiences and that people are turning to an ever-broadening range of sources for their information. These changes provide both a challenge and an opportunity for political parties to connect directly with voters. "If you're going to use these technologies," he said, "you need to let people interact, because that's what's falling out of the political process."

Once the convention was over and the Gore campaign was in high gear, O'Connor ran the vice-president's debate preparation. Before each of the three debates, Gore and his senior staffers retreated to a quiet location to concentrate on likely questions and scenarios, using a mock set and a senior adviser playing George W. Bush. "More than anything," O'Connor said, "it's a chance for the candidate to come out of campaigning mode and focus for a day or two."

After election day, O'Connor remained in Los Angeles, shutting down the convention operation. While he did not travel to Florida, he was obviously a very interested spectator. Noting his belief that harping on any political loss "can be paralyzing for the democratic process," O'Connor reflected on the notorious 2000 election: "Because the networks briefly called the election for Bush, Gore was stuck [in the post-election process] making up the difference. I don't think that was fair...If it had still been a toss-up Wednesday morning, it would have been a different environment." What troubles him most is that "as a nation, we were not committed to counting every vote." If that razor-thin margin had gone the other way, O'Connor would most likely be working in the White House today.

The White House, however, would not be a new experience. After the 1992 election, he worked in the vice-president's office for three and a half years, moving up from aide (to the chief of staff) to scheduler (handling Gore's daily activities, including travelling here and abroad to arrange the vice-president's trips). "It's a 24 hour a day job," he said of working in the White House, "but it's a phenomenal experience. If you ever get to the point where you're not a little bit in awe of what's going on around you, then you should leave."

Despite his exposure to the inner workings of our government, O'Connor displays none of the cynicism that many have been led to believe exists there: "I believe very strongly in the notion that people ought to participate in our government. There are a number of barriers, or perceived barriers, to participation now." As a small gesture toward overcoming this perception, he often used his evening staff tour privileges at the White House to invite a random family of tourists inside. "That's a little metaphor for what we struggle against," he said. "The White House seems so inaccessible to people. They stand there outside the fence taking pictures of a house where the guy who works for them does business every day. I thought it was important to let people touch their government."

O'Connor's political interest started early, as an eight-year-old delivering leaflets on his bicycle for a congressional candidate in Virginia's 8th district. Then, during his senior year at Hampden-Sydney, he took President Emeritus Wilson's course in national security; Wilson once remarked that he had never run into anybody from Hampden-Sydney during his years attending meetings at the White House, or at the Pentagon, or on Capitol Hill. "I thought 'well, I can do this'," O'Connor recalled; "It was a motivating factor for me."

Today, O'Connor is the vice-president for corporate affairs at CityNet Telecommunications, a fiber-optic network provider. Despite this move into the private sector, he still keeps his hands in the political waters, working with the Democratic National Committee chairman on 2004 convention plans and speaking at Harvard beside the Republican convention organizer.

"When you've done this a couple times, you know how to do a TV buy, how to do direct mail, how to organize a precinct, and how to prepare for a debate. These are skills acquired only through expe-rience."

TODD REID '96

Todd Reid '96 did not wait until he was out of school to become a political professional. Instead, he ran campaigns out of his dorm room. Now the Regional Political Director for the Republican National Committee in five southern states, Reid has been involved in one campaign or another since 1993, when he volunteered over spring break for Jim Gilmore's race for Virginia attorney general.

Instead of coming back to classes with a Caribbean tan, Reid returned with the responsibility for running Gilmore's Southside campaign. Using his Hampden House dorm as headquarters, he began juggling academics and politics. All his professors were very accommodating, although his roommate was peeved at having elderly campaign volunteers show up for leaflets and lawn signs early on Saturday mornings.

When Gilmore began preparing to run for governor of Virginia in early 1996, Reid became his first campaign staffer. Thus when most of his classmates were easing into their rewards of being a spring semester senior, Reid was commuting back and forth from Richmond, knee-deep in political waters. Come graduation, he worked full time on the Gilmore campaign. After that victory, Reid worked on the transition team, and then became an assistant to the Governor's chief of staff.

Like Rod O'Connor, Reid has been fortunate to start his career while affiliated with a rising political star. In Governor Gilmore's administration, he moved into the technology office before being asked to become the executive director of the New Majority Project, a political action committee formed by Gilmore to win Republican control of the State Assembly. In this role, Reid directed a $4 million operation and oversaw five field directors. He worked closely with individual campaigns on fundraising and strategy. Many political experts doubted the wisdom of this novel statewide effort, but it proved effective, placing the Republicans in complete control of state government. Reid recruited a number of Hampden-Sydney men for the project, including Ken Hutcheson '94, Greg Thomas '99, and Kevin Terminella '99. "The governor used to joke that this whole thing was just a Hampden-Sydney operation from the top down," Reid recalled. "We were grabbing guys just out of school and putting them in jobs."

After the successful election of 1999, Reid moved to the Virginia Republican Party and began working as a director of the Victory 2000 Project. Again he worked with a number of the same Hampden-Sydney guys (adding Randy Marcus '00 to the mix this time). With

$7 million raised, most of their efforts were directed at helping George Allen unseat Senator Chuck Robb. After the 2000 elections, President Bush appointed Governor Gilmore to be the chairman of the Republican National Committee and, in turn, Reid was named Regional Political Director for Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee. In this position, he works with state parties and candidates to promote Republican goals. "By and large, I am the RNC to these state groups," Reid said. His focus this summer was the successful congressional campaign of Randy Forbes in Chesapeake. This fall, the Virginia governor's race will be the centerpiece, while in 2002 he expects to travel all over the south.

Juggling five states can be a challenge, since each has a different primary schedule and party organization. Reid carries around a big binder full of the names and facts he has to keep straight. Providing assistance, in any way possible, is the basis of his role. "If you think of each state party as a small business," he said, "I'm their consultant." At the same time, however, he is also the state party's conduit to the vastly larger resources of the national party. "It helps to have a lot of money at your disposal," he said, although this often puts him in the tough position of deciding who's worth backing with the party's money. To make that decision, he has to rely on pollsters, the status of other races, and on his own hunches. Because his only goal is to help Republicans win, Reid does not put himself in the position of enforcing any party platform or ideology. Similarly, he does not get involved in party primaries because to do so would be akin to putting the national party in the awkward position of taking sides in a family contest.

"I have no desire whatsoever to run for anything," Reid said. He does, however, have great respect for politicians: "You've always got to remember that it's the candidates' names on the ballot and they have to live with that. Winning or losing can be a life-changing event for them." Increasingly though, these candidates must turn to professional help to win elections. Gone are the days of Mr. Smith going to Washington armed with sincerity and a firm jaw. To Reid this evolution seems natural: "When you've done this a couple times, you know how to do a TV buy, how to do direct mail, how to organize a precinct, and how to prepare for a debate. These are skills acquired only through experience." He attributes the rise of the professional consultant largely to the amount of money being spent these days. Within this profession, Republicans and Democrats maintain an Iron Curtain of separation, although Reid runs across the same Democratic consultants in different elections. Like reading the scouting report on an opposing pitcher, he tries to learn from the consultant's past strategies.

In developing a campaign strategy, the consultant needs to adapt to the local political culture. "Not every campaign is the same," he said, "what works in New York will not work in Virginia, or Alabama, or California." One reliable barometer for Reid is what he calls "the Mom test," showing ads and mailings to his mother to see if she thinks they go too far.

DURING EACH ELECTION CYCLE, Chris Cooper '93, a Democratic direct mail consultant, produces dozens of campaign pieces for clients around the country. While he may not use the "Mom test" in every case, he does rely on having a "smorgasbord of knowledge" about regional and local political cultures. "I've worked in many states, 20 and counting now," he said, which enables him to tailor the message to his audience. "It's easier to do negative mail than positive mail, and more fun," he said. Besides, as he and other consultants agree, "Negative political communication works."

Direct mail is a specialized realm, distinct from the "media" people who do television and radio. Within a campaign, however, all the consultants work together under the direction of the campaign manager, to coordinate both message and strategy. Everything is driven by poll numbers, Cooper explains: "We find out which messages move which audiences." At the same time, consultants need to woo an increasingly skeptical electorate: "We try to make the pieces not look political. If it doesn't get opened, it's a waste of money." During this past election, Cooper introduced more interactive mailings, using scratch-off panels and elaborate fold-outs to hold the voter's attention. In the direct mail business, he's also competing against junk mail, such as catalogs and coupon books. The advantage of direct mail is that it is cheaper and more targeted than television. A TV spot aimed at Northern Virginia voters is also reaching homes in Maryland and D.C., whereas a mail piece goes directly to the homes of targeted voters. "There's so much spending on campaigns," Cooper explained, "because TV costs have gone through the roof."

After graduation from Hampden-Sydney, Cooper took the first steps toward becoming the self-proclaimed "political junkie" he is today. He met with Joe Maupin '54, who works for South Carolina Senator Fritz Hollings, and landed a staff assistant job on the Senate Commerce Committee's aviation subcommittee. He had already interned for Senator Strom Thurmond (a "rite of passage for South Carolinians," he said). At the end of 1993, Cooper became the "body man" or travelling assistant when Joe Riley, the mayor of Charleston, ran for SC governor. "It was addictive," he said of his first campaign job, "Politics was in my blood at that point." When they lost the primary runoff by 1600 votes (less than one vote per precinct), Cooper said he, "learned how one vote can make a difference."

He then returned to Washington and did a series of committee and lobbying jobs before jumping into campaign consulting, running congressional races in South Carolina and Louisiana. Because political work is so cyclical, there is a constant scramble for jobs, especially in the odd, off-election, years. Cooper began working for a direct mail firm that abruptly closed its doors at the end of 1998. In 2000, he joined Crounse, Malchow, Schlackman & Hoppey, the largest Democratic direct mail firm in the country and hence a company that is able to weather the boom and bust electoral cycle, though even their payroll shrinks dramatically during an odd year. This summer, Cooper's time was spent on a ballpark referendum in Albuquerque, New Mexico and on campaigns in New York City, Massachusetts, and New Jersey.

Because politics is a winner-take-all game, consultants build their reputations by working for winners. This means finding clients with both a good chance of winning (incumbents are almost always a safet bet) and the financial resources to run an effective campaign. Despite the fact that consultants are strictly divided into Democratic firms and Republican firms, ideology rarely comes any further into play. "As a consultant," Cooper said, "it doesn't matter so much what my personal politics are. I'm working to help get my clients elected." Each campaign has to develop a battle plan and then stick to it. "Candidates often get knocked off stride by reacting too much to their opponent," Cooper observed. "It's our job to help them see the big picture."

In the down and dirty world of professional campaigning, it's not easy to remain idealistic about the political system, but Cooper manages to keep the end goal in sight: "I believe in politics and public service. I believe the people I help elect are doing good things for people. If you lose, you don't have the chance to make changes." He also shuns the facile condemnation of politicians: "The media are disinclined to believe anything good about politicians. I like politicians. I admire these people who are willing to stick their necks on the line and be rejected by their peers."

WHILE HE WORKS FOR THE other side, Marshall Manson '96 agrees: "I think most politicians get a bad rap. It's the 1% who get indicted who cause everybody else problems." As a Republican political consultant and direct mail specialist, he works closely with a range of politicians. "The candidates who win," he said, "are the ones who recognize their assets but then surround themselves with good people and listen to them. The micromanagers, who want to do everything themselves, are the most difficult."

To Manson, the rise of professional operatives makes sense: "People like us have replaced, in many ways, political party organizations. Parties, especially at the local level, are not equipped to run campaigns anymore. And as parties have become weaker and less effective, consultants have taken over the role of assisting candidates. The rank and file is learning that having a good consultant around helps your campaign." Despite the often mercenary tone of much political consulting, Manson claimed that it's not that cynical: "Every person I know who works full time in politics has some ideological component. There's got to be something more than money to motivate you to work 20-hour days during a fall election cycle. As a Republican, my ideology is to get as many Republicans elected as possible."

Manson is, however, cynical about the political education most Americans receive. He would rather have a well-informed electorate, because he believes his arguments are more persuasive. "Voters are very savvy now," he observed, "but they are poorly-informed." For Manson, much of the blame for this ignorance rests with the media, which provides only superficial political coverage. "It is impossible for an elected official to communicate with the voters in any way but through paid media," he said, adding that "local TV news is a joke."

Like his friend Todd Reid, Manson started working in politics during college, first for Jim Miller (who was running against Ollie North for the Republican senate nomination) and then as the campaign manager for a state senate race. After graduation in 1996, he joined an attorney general campaign, then went to Kentucky to work on a congressional campaign. Despite the fact that all his early efforts were on losing campaigns, Manson felt bitten by the political bug. He moved into media work and is now working for the Sterling Corporation, a political consulting firm based in Fredericksburg. In addition to heading their direct mail operation, he does corporate consulting in the off-years. To him, communicating with voters and with customers is largely the same process. In campaign mode, his firm offers strategic guidance and planning, media advertising, and direct mail and print ads. They can also coordinate web development, polling, and research. Because Michigan is the firm's cornerstone state, Manson devoted 65-70% of his time to Michigan this past fall, with the balance spent on Virginia and North Carolina.

Campaign consultant Marshall Manson '96 produces direct mailings for Republican candidates.

Manson is unapologetic about negative advertising: "If voters are turned off by advertising, that's their problem. We're not going to walk away from something that works. We try to figure out the best way to win a race. Sometimes the best way is to take a sledgehammer to your opponent on TV. Sometimes it's not." He admitted that this seems a bit Machiavellian, but said that increasingly savvy voters are narrowing the range of what works. With an often polarized electorate, consultants are left chasing the swinging middle third of the voters. At the same time, Manson has to ensure that the Republican third comes out to the polls.

If the budget allows, many campaigns will hire an opposition researcher to investigate their opponent and to predict what the other campaign is going to harp on with their own candidate. "It's not as sleazy as it sounds," Manson said, since the researcher mainly focuses on voting records, tax records, and court records. Of course if something juicier turns up, it may work its way into the campaign. One of the keys to a successful direct mail campaign is, "defining your opponent before he can define himself." This requires, of course, plenty of polling to test messages and strategies. "I look at so many polls it makes my eyes cross," said Manson, who noted that the most accurate and extensive polls belong to campaigns, as opposed to the cheaper polls and pollsters hired by newspapers.

In a statement that was echoed by his fellow alumni, Manson said, "There are times I get discouraged by the political process, but on the whole I think our system works really well. I'm just afraid that fewer and fewer people believe this." By working inside the political system, whether as Republicans or Democrats, Hampden-Sydney alumni are doing their part to make the system work better and to better connect the rest of us to it.

Alumni judges discuss the parade of life they witness in Virginia's General District Court

Four Men of the Bench

By Peter Davies

"I don't think you can study to be a judge. You do need to have an appreciation for the human experience and condition, which the study of literature and history certainly provides."

AL TALLEY '66
General District Court Judge

THE FLUVANNA COUNTY COURTHOUSE, with its swinging wooden gates, high arched windows, and somber portraits of dead luminaries, is straight out of classic Hollywood. It does not take much of an imagination to see Gregory Peck or Henry Fonda making an impassioned plea for justice here, casting his eyes over the public somberly assembled in the balcony.

On a recent Monday morning, however, the National Historic landmark building creaked and groaned through a less cinematic court session as the Honorable Al Talley '66 presided over the day's small claims and misdemeanors. A steady stream of county residents came forward to make their claims, speak their testimony, or defend their actions. Less cinematic perhaps, but no less dramatic.

Welcome to General District Court, one of the last places in Virginia, and perhaps the country, where justice is dispensed quickly and directly. There are no juries, no cameras, and not many lawyers. Most defendants stand alone before the judge, plead their cases, and receive a speedy decision. For those of us accustomed to seeing courtrooms only on television, whether it is The People's Court, Judge Judy, or Court TV, the real thing is somewhat jarring. It is unedited and often chaotic. And it is not being presented for anyone's entertainment. Defendants mumble their pleas, attorneys deal in rapid-fire legal jargon, and the judges, unlike many of their TV peers, do not mock the defendants or badger them about their moral shortcomings. Instead, the judges dispense case after case of real and binding decisions, a fact that even some defendants do not seem to realize until they find themselves standing in front of the bench being asked how they plead.

It takes a certain personality to be a good judge and Hampden-Sydney appears to be a wellspring of it. While there are numerous alumni judges throughout Virginia and around the nation, the 16th district (the area in and around Charlottesville) contains a particularly dense concentration of them. In addition to Talley, the district is composed of Bill Barkley '70, Roger Morton '67, and until just recently, Steve Helvin '66.

To a man, these judges are happy with general district court. Offered the opportunity to move up to circuit court, they have declined and will decline it. Circuit court, which handles felonies, misdemeanor appeals, and civil cases involving amounts greater than $15,000, means longer trials, often involving juries, and more lawyers. The judge's role becomes mediated through a more complicated web of case law, motions, and adjournments. According to Barkley, "It's the people more than the law in general district court. The further you go up the judicial line, the more it becomes about the law." In just one recent afternoon, for example, Barkley dealt with a college student arrested for underage drinking, a man who skipped out on a taxi fare, a road rage altercation, and then tried to find a translator for a man from Indonesia. For these four Hampden-Sydney judges, this daily exposure to the vivid cross-section of humanity makes their jobs interesting and is not worth trading for greater authority. Even if they're seeing the same charges over and over again, the details are always different. The person behind the crime or the lawsuit always has his or her own story to tell. As Morton summarized it, "What's the best part of the job? The people. The worst part? The people."

AFTER 21 YEARS ON THE general district court bench, Steve Helvin decided to step down this summer. In typically modest fashion, he said he "wants to make room for someone else." With his son graduating from the University of Virginia law school this spring, he figured it was the right time to retire. The youngest judge in Virginia when he started, Helvin now plans to enjoy himself (primarily by fishing), but he will work on occasion as a retired substitute judge.

While he took over Helvin's Albemarle seat this summer, for "variety," Bill Barkley has been the Charlottesville general district court judge since 1990. Prior to this, he was a substitute judge for 8 years and worked as a trial attorney in Charlottesville, even practicing before Judge Helvin. A Charlottesville native, he entered the local bar after law school at Washington & Lee. "It's the way lawyering used to be," he said of general district court; "you show up and try the case."

Now the senior judge in the district, Al Talley has been on the bench for seventeen years, covering the counties of Fluvanna, Louisa, Goochland, and Orange (where he does civil cases only). Before this he had been a substitute judge, and worked as both the commonwealth's attorney in Fluvanna and as a defense attorney all over the district. After law school at the University of Virginia, Talley had a clerkship on the Fourth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in Richmond, which gave him the chance to observe "cutting edge law and the hot topics of the day, as well as the best lawyers." In retrospect, "it gave me a lot of respect for the judicial system," he said. A year later, he returned home to Palmyra and began practicing as the third lawyer in town.

The newest member of the bench, Roger Morton presides in the counties of Culpeper, Madison, and Orange (traffic and criminal cases only). After graduating from the University of Richmond law school, he went into private practice in Culpeper as "a country lawyer, doing a little bit of everything." While he had been interested in the bench before, it took until 1998 to be in the right place at the right time. So far, he loves the job, especially the opportunity to understand what makes people tick. He cited one recent case of what he termed "hamburger rage," a woman attacking an employee at the drive-thru when her order was botched. According to Morton, a case like this makes you stop and think, "What is really happening here? There has to be something in that woman's life that made her act this way over a hamburger."

WHEN ASKED WHY HAMPDEN-Sydney has produced so many judges, especially in the 16th district, nobody had a definitive answer. Helvin emphasized that, "it was not the good old boy network. We had no role in selecting each other." In fact, they all came to the bench at different times and under slightly different circumstances. In general, the appointment process has become more competitive and politicized in recent years. Morton, the newest judge, began with an interim appointment after the legislative caucus reached a deadlock in the nomination process. He has since been appointed to a regular six-year term.

At the time of his appointment, Helvin faced little competition; this year, however, when it was time to name his successor, many of Charlottesville's most experienced trial lawyers vied for the position. When the new judge was named, some joked that Hampden-Sydney should give him an honorary degree, just to keep the circle intact. According to Barkley this joke could easily send the wrong message: "I'm concerned that if people see the court as a Hampden-Sydney club, that could reflect negatively on the court." He finds it

"You try to make everyone feel like they've been treated fairly."

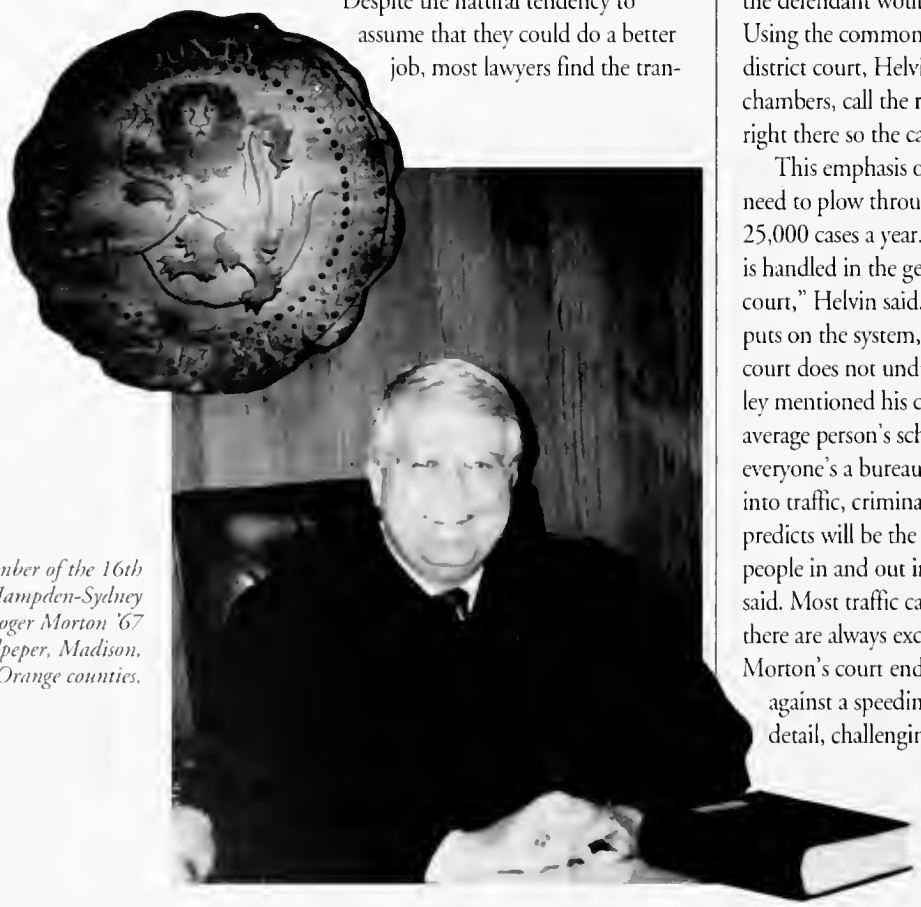
General District Court Judge

"interesting" that Hampden-Sydney produces so many judges, but he wonders if anything more should be made of it. "It don't know if there's a cause and effect," he said, "or if it's just a coincidence."

They all agree, however, that the liberal arts education they received is as good a preparation for the bench as they can imagine. As Talley observed, "I don't think you can study to be a judge. You do need to have an appreciation for the human experience and condition, which the study of literature and history certainly provides." He noted, however, that there is an increasing need for judges with scientific and technical backgrounds, given the complexity of current forensic evidence. This trend is probably least apparent at the general district court level, where most cases still revolve around familiar evidence like contracts, radar guns, and eyewitnesses.

All of the judges had prior experience as trial attorneys and thus saw plenty of other judges in action, giving them the chance to decide what they liked or disliked about various judicial styles. While prosecutors and defense attorneys have plenty of opinions about the judges they appear before, the judges almost never catch wind of them. As Helvin recalled, "when you lose a case as an attorney, you usually need to blame it on something and the judge is the easiest scapegoat." Judges, therefore, ofren have only the vaguest idea of their reputation around the courthouse.

Despite the natural tendency to assume that they could do a better job, most lawyers find the transition to the bench to be a dramatic leap. According to Barkley, "Judging is so different from lawyering. Many people compare it to a professional athlete becoming a referee, which almost never happens." Morton notes that, "It is easier to be an advocate than to be impartial. As a judge, you have to be equally attentive to both sides." Striking this judicial balance may come more naturally to some people than to others. "Some lawyers are such advocates that they could never refrain from jumping in and questioning people," said Barkley. He admits, however, that this level of absolute restraint does not always lead to the most just result. On occasion, he will interject to ask a question overlooked by an attorney or to clarify matters for somebody representing himself.



The newest member of the 16th district Hampden-Sydney group, Roger Morton '67 presides in Culpeper, Madison, and Orange counties.

Helvin provided the following hypothetical example of how some judicial intervention can greater serve the common good: In a simple civil suit over a car repair bill, the defendant's attorney challenges the plaintiff's bill because it has not been properly notarized. The plaintiff, who is representing himself (which is quite common in small claims cases), knew nothing about the need for a notary. The attorney, who is doing what he is paid to do, presses the inadmissibility of the repair bill. At this point Helvin said he could adjourn the case, allowing time for the plaintiff to get the bill notarized. This, however, would mean that both the plaintiff and the defendant have to come back to court again (and the defendant would have to pay for his attorney again). Using the common sense that seems to define general district court, Helvin would bring the parties into his chambers, call the repair shop, and get the bill verified right there so the case could reach a speedy conclusion.

This emphasis on practical solutions stems from the need to plow through a docket that can number around 25,000 cases a year. "Ninety percent of all legal business is handled in the general district court. It's a volume court," Helvin said. Despite the strain that this volume puts on the system, these judges try to ensure that the court does not unduly inconvenience the public. Barkley mentioned his concern with accommodating the average person's schedule and remembering that "not everyone's a bureaucrat." Talley breaks his docket down into traffic, criminal, and civil cases, saving what he predicts will be the longest cases for last. "I try to get people in and out in a reasonable amount of time," he said. Most traffic cases can be handled quickly, though there are always exceptions. A recent session in Judge Morton's court ended with a lawyer defending herself against a speeding ticket. She went into extensive detail, challenging the accuracy of the state trooper's radar equipment and the calibration of his tuning forks on the day in question.

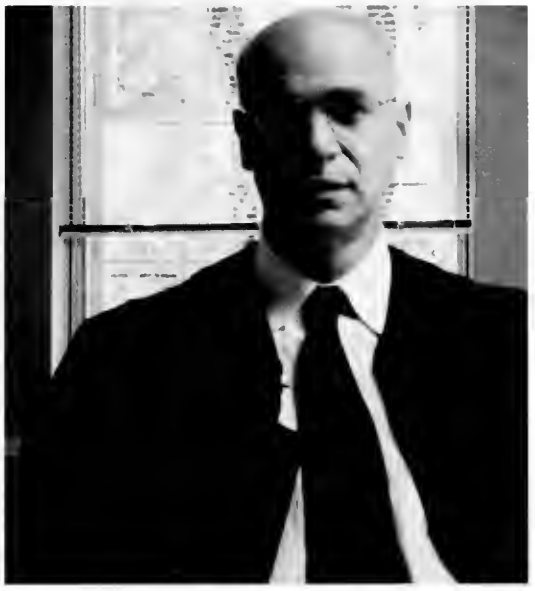
Much of the appeal of general district court for these judges is a byproduct of this volume. Because these are relatively minor cases, involving either misdemeanors or civil suits under $15,000, they avoid the lengthy and complex lawyering that can drag other courts down to a standstill. Helvin recalled an old Art Buchwald column claiming that the real drag on our legal system was caused by good lawyers, who could find a way to challenge every shred of evidence. If there were just more bad lawyers, the argument went, things would move along more quickly. Helvin jokingly concluded, "Bad lawyers make your life easy, good lawyers make it hard."

SINCE MANY OF THE PEOPLE who appear before them lack legal sophistication, or the money to hire it, these judges are very concerned that everyone understands the proceedings. "I like trying to convince people that the system does work," said Talley, who thinks more citizens should go to court just to witness justice in action. As with most of the judges, he has little interest in made-for-TV courtroom shows, preferring the good old days when the county courthouse was a primary form of public entertainment and instruction. "We represent the conscience of the community," he explained. Barkley said he is often surprised by how little people know about the courts. Thus, he feels a duty to explain how things work, especially since district court is often a person's first exposure to the legal system. Everyone has a right to understand the proceedings, even if he needs the help of an interpreter to do so. "I want people to know why I'm doing what I'm doing," he said.

Because of the volume of cases, the judges are always trying to maintain a balance between efficiency and fairness. Even when the docket bulges, they work hard to ensure that speed doesn't trump the right to a fair and thorough trial. Helvin said he often struggled with the challenge of, as he put it, "striking a balance between not wasting people's time and giving everybody a fair hearing."

A serious concern with the integrity, and the perceived integrity, of the judicial system lies at the heart of what these judges do. Because they work in the closest thing to a "people's court," they all take great pains to make the proceedings as fair and open as possible and to ensure that the court remains, in Helvin's words, "a search for the truth." They all believe in the workings of the system and they want the public to believe in it, too. "You try to make everyone feel like they've been treated fairly," said Morton, noting that the general district level is "everyman's chance in court." As Talley said, "This court is so important because it's the only place I know where you can come in and tell your story, answer a few questions, and get an immediate decision. There's really no other place in government where this is true."



Bill Barkley '77 recently moved from the Charlottesville to the Albermarle court, taking over Steve Helvin's seat.

A key component of this integrity is the assurance that all people are equal before the law, no marter what their standing in society. In Charlottesville district court, this means that University of Virginia students receive the same treatment as everybody else. It does not matter whether the defendant shows up in a navy blue blazer, wearing shorts and flip-flops, or strapped down in handcuffs and leg irons. Justice aims to be blind, even if the steady stream of humanity in and out of the courtroom is eye-opening. "You never decide a case because the person looks like the bully in my third-grade class," Helvin said. This equal treatment also extends to ensuring that everyone understands the proceedings, even if they don't understand English. Helvin recalled one day in his courtroom when a migrant worker needed a Spanish interpreter and the only person available was Laurence Eagleburger, the former secretary of state, who was appearing as a witness in another case but jumped right in and eagerly helped the man.

Recidivists pose a challenge to any judge's patience. Naturally, it's easier to maintain an objective view when faced with an unknown defendant. When the same person returns again and again, however, impartiality is difficult to maintain. Because these judges work the same courts for years, they invariably run across familiar faces and families, whether it is the man who keeps driving with a suspended license or the sisters who keep writing bad checks. As Helvin noted, "You get tired of seeing people hurt each other." To Morton, the trick is in maintaining a "hard balance between doing the right thing with each individual case and still having a consistency across the board that's fair to everybody." To maintain some perspective Talley advised "separating bad people from those who do something ill-advised.

There are people who for one reason or another can't live by the same rules the rest of us do."

Of course, any system run on human judgement is fallible, as the judges will all admit. Sometimes the case presented to them is incomplete—a witness or a key piece of evidence is missing. Sometimes they find out they were fooled by someone's perjured statement. Or, as Morton pointed out, people can see the same event differently and not necessarily be lying. "If you have ten witnesses, you'll get ten different versions of what happened," he said. When faced with a tough case, "you make the call and you move on," as Talley put it. At the general district level, however, any decision can be appealed to the circuit court. "If we do make a bad call," Talley explained, "people have the right to appeal it. We don't do death penalty cases—nothing here is that final." When a case reaches the circuit court, it may well be substantially different from the one heard in general district court. Talley added that some defense lawyers will use district court as part of the discovery process, i.e. they go in with the intention not of winning the case but of learning what evidence the commonwealth has against their client that can later be used during the circuit court appeal.

There are those cases, however, that lack a ready decision. Civil cases, which are decided only on a preponderance of evidence, can be the most difficult. As Helvin points out, the civil cases in general district court can be just as complex as in higher courts; they simply don't involve as much money. In criminal law, where somebody's liberty may be at stake, the burden of proof can often settle the indecision. As Barkley observed, "'Beyond a reasonable doubt' is a tremendous burden." Nonetheless, some cases require an extra degree of reflection. For Helvin, this process is measured out by his drive home: "If I'm still worried about a case by the time I reach K-Mart, which is about halfway, that's a reasonable doubt." A judge has to learn to become comfortable with the power entrusted to him. As Barkley put it, "Every time I make a decision, one side is not going to like it."

BECAUSE JUDGES ARE THE primary representatives of the judicial system, they can never really take off their robes. While Talley claimed that, "When you leave the bench, you're just like everybody else," this is often easier said than done, especially in a small town where judges don't have the luxury of anonymity. In most situations, their first name becomes "Judge," instead of "Roger" or "Bill." And because Virginia judges are non-partisan, they are barred from any political activity. As the newest judge, Morton still remembers his transition to the bench: "As a judge, you're forced into a role. You have to hold yourself apart from the lawyers you used to be buddy-buddy with. At first it bothered me, but now I've come to accept it." He said judges dread being asked on the street "Do you remember me?" In short, it becomes much more than a job. "You can't pretend you're not a judge when you leave the office," Barkley said; "People want their judges to act a certain way. They treat you differently."

Despite all this, Hampden-Sydney's judges are happy doing what they do. "This is the best job in the system," said Talley. In some ways, Morton said, it's really a simple job: "All you have to do is make a decision."

The true story of how the Revolutionary War almost reached Hampden-Sydney's doorstep

THE RECORD OF HAMPDEN-SYDNEY COLLEGE

Summer 2001

The British Are Coming!

By William E. Thompson, College Chaplain

Listen! My children! And you shall hear
Of frightening times when the British drew near
To the College of Hampden and Sydney renown—
Named for two martyrs that challenged the Crown.
Hardly a man is now alive
Who remembers Cornwallis and Tarleton's drive,
When rumors from southlands brought us to fear
The wrath of King George on all that was dear.
From every Prince Edward village and farm,
From College and Church there sounded alarm!
The steel of defiance was quickly forthcoming
When riders brought news, 'The British are coming!'
Our tutors named Witherspoon and Smith with a J.
Led forth our stalwarts to challenging fray,
With shirts that were dyed in juice of poke-berries,
Our students all whacked the Redcoats' "derrières."
Well ... it didn't all happen exactly that way,
But if you'll allow me, we'll say so this day!

WE'VE ALL HEARD STORIES about Hampden-Sydney's Revolutionary War heritage, but what is the real story of our response to the frequent rumors around the Virginia countryside that the British were coming? There were at least five separate times during the American Revolution when our academical village reacted with alarms and with arms, to echoes of Longfellow's and Revere's famous call, "The British are Coming! The British are Coming!" and there was one time when the Redcoats actually got here, although on that summer's day in 1781 the British who invaded here were actually wearing green coats. Exactly why Colonel Banastre Tarleton's notorious Legion did not destroy the few buildings of this College, which intentionally bore the names of two anti-Royalist martyrs, will probably remain as the College's enduring mystery of the American Revolution.

Despite our famous 1776 birthdate, the College actually got underway in November of 1775, or seven months after the Battles of Lexington and Concord. Of our first four faculty members, one, the presiding officer and teacher, Samuel Stanhope Smith, was the son-in-law of the Rev. John Witherspoon of Princeton, New Jersey, and another one was David Witherspoon, President Smith's brother-in-law and Princeton President Witherspoon's son. When those two faculty members began to teach classes here, their father/father-in-law was already an elected member of the Second Continental Congress that would eventually adopt the Declaration of Independence, so there is no way that this military and political revolution could have been avoided as an object of conversation, classroom teaching, and pulpit preaching. Indeed, one of the very reasons why the College was here in the first place was that too many monarchists had been coming in with clout and influence at the College of William & Mary, the only "higher education" alternative in the Virginia colony at that time. For years the most famous freedom-firing sounds in the Virginia General Assembly had belonged to one of our College Trustees, Patrick Henry. Once our independence had been formally declared, Mr. Henry was chosen as the Commonwealth's first elected Governor, serving for three successive one-year terms, from 1776 to 1779.

While patriotic fervor and rhetoric were at a height in the famous summer of 1776, some 65 members of the student body— many of them under the minimal draft and enlistment age of 16— formed a schoolboy militia unit here, with daily drills, training in the manual of arms, and a monthly public muster, or military review. It was apparently at these monthly musters that the students first appeared in their homespun, maroon (or garnet) shirts that had been dyed with pokeberry juice. This militia unit adopted the name, "The Hampden-Sydney Boys," and it seems to have definitely been the first and perhaps the only such college military unit anywhere in the colonies.

I. "The British are coming!"

This schoolboy unit was at the ready in the fall of 1776, when a British expeditionary force briefly landed at Norfolk. In Williamsburg, Governor Henry reacted by sending riders off in every direction, with the cry, "The British are coming!" He called on every county with existing militia units (generally comparable to later-day National Guardsmen) to send them to the Tidewater area posthaste, since all of the regular Virginia soldiers of the Continental Line were already engaged in the northern colonies, where the military revolution had thus far been the most active. For some reason, however, "The Hampden-Sydney Boys" did not actually go at this time, although it does appear that one 14-year old student from our first year's enrollment—a lad named Clement Carrington III—simply truanted himself from his classes, signed on with the Prince Edward County militia unit that did go in 1776, and became the first Hampden-Sydney student to serve in the Revolutionary War.

II. "The British Are Coming!"

Hampden-Sydney classes ran throughout the summer in those early years, and in the following summer of 1777 Tidewater Virginia appeared again to be under an immediate threat when a sizable British fleet appeared off the Virginia Capes. This time when Governor Henry called for all existing counties to send militia immediately, the entire "Hampden-Sydney Boys" went, perhaps still sporting their pokeberry maroon. Those remaining in class must have been few (those under 16) and the class lectures themselves must have been reduced, since two of the professors, John Blair Smith and David Witherspoon, were officers in the company. They marched off to Williamsburg to stand behind the hastily assembled breastworks for about six weeks. We know the specific length of their tour of duty because their quartermaster wagons were supplied by College trustee and founder, Nathaniel Venable of "Slate Hill" Plantation (who had a son who was an officer in the company), and the records remain of the colonial government's payments to Mr. Venable for the length his wagons and accompanying slaves were in service of the Commonwealth. We also can guess that they probably approached Williamsburg from south of the James Rivet, since Venable's expense account included reimbursement for "river ferriage."

This late summer alarm of 1777 was quite real all right, but the British expeditionary force made only a feint on the Peninsula. "The Hampden-Sydney Boys" were principally camped at Suffolk during this August-September "early fall break" and when dismissed they were personally thanked by Governor Henry, presumably with much pride in these students from "his own" institution.

An interesting footnote to this 1777 expedition lies in the fact that this part of our story almost did not happen at all, since Virginia's most persuasive Assemblyman and, by now, famed Declaration author, Thomas Jefferson, had introduced a bill that spring in the Virginia House of Delegates that would have exempted William & Mary and Hampden-Sydney students from military service; that bill came complete with the predictable language about "not grinding up Virginia's seed corn," but to the surprise of many, Jefferson's proposal failed.

III. "The British Are Coming!"

It has long been said, and printed, that Professor and Captain John Blair Smith led the pokeberry company of "Hampden-Sydney Boys" to Petersburg again in the following summer of 1778, when once more Governor Henry sent out his couriers to summon backwoods defenders of Tidewater interests and real estate, but in actuality this 1778 call to the barricades lacks a primary source backing. We mainly have this 1778 expedition on secondary authority from one Wade Mosby, who wrote it down 55 years later, in 1832. By 1779 Virginia had a new Governor (Jefferson had replaced Henry) and a new capital (Richmond had replaced Williamsburg as a more defensible site), and Hampden-Sydney College had a new President. Sam Smith's 23-year-old brother John replaced him as our presiding officer. Because of his erstwhile "military service," this transplanted New Jersey gentleman (who by now had married a Prince Edward belle) carried the ambivalent title of "Captain John Smith," a legendary-sounding name that was bound to impress all native Virginians. But truthfully this "Captain John Smith" was somewhat suspect in those military areas, as the next alarm bell would clearly indicate.

IV. "The British Are Coming!"

This time they did come, although not all the way. The main Revolutionary War battlelines finally came to the interior of the southern colonies in the 1780's. It began when General Earl Cornwallis conquered Charleston and moved across the Palmetto colony, with a series of victories that climaxed at Camden in late 1780. As Cornwallis continued to move northward from Charlotte, after his defeats at King's Mountain and Cowpens, he was briefly checked at every river crossing by hastily-assembled militiamen and regular troops, all of whom were under the command of General Nathanael Greene, "the Fighting Quaker," whose key soldier was a meteoric 23-year old cavalry–man named "Light Horse Harry" Lee of Virginia. When the colonial forces challenged Cornwallis at Cowan's Ford on the Catawba River, northwest of Charlotte, not only was my three-times great grandfather, Thomas Cowan, wounded at the ford that bears his name, but also the commanding officer of that wing of General Greene's army, General William Lee Davidson, was killed. Eventually Presbyterian educators in that same piedmont area—who had many ties to Hampden-Sydney—would found a new college near that tragic river crossing, and would name the school "Davidson" for the fallen general.

Cornwallis continued to press ever onward in that late winter while General Greene steadily retreated before him. There were two methods to the madness of Greene's continuing retreat: one, he was ever-lengthening the British supply lines to dangerous dimensions, and two, as he fell back toward Virginia, he sent couriers to gather all able-bodied young men from central Virginia to give battle. Cornwallis had hoped to trap Greene before he got safely across the Dan, but he failed and General Greene moved into Virginia, in the area just northeast of present-day South Boston. Greene's successful retreat across the Dan River was one of the great tactical maneuvers of the war. (The Quartermaster General who directed this was Edward Carrington, three of whose nephews attended Hampden-Sydney in the late 18th century.) Greene's exhausted army rested awhile on the hillsides in Halifax County, north of the winter-flooded Dan River, glaring at the British.

At this point recruiter horsemen fanned out broadly into this area of Southside Virginia, with the urgent cry, "The British are coming!" and many young men in our student body simply dropped all pretense at classes, and hurriedly rode off to defend hearth and home—but not as a body, although the student company apparently still existed as a drilling group, especially among those who were under 16. At about this same time, in the early spring of 1781, other British forces under the infamous traitor General Benedict Arnold were advancing up the James River from Hampton Roads, so those members of our student body with Tidewater roots were also bailing out to hurry off to the east. For a while in the spring of 1781, in fact, there were hardly any students on the Hill at all, certainly not any over 16 years of age. Captain John Blair Smith similarly abandoned this place, and rode off to catch up with friends and students. He was undoubtedly motivated by his own self-assumption of his military prowess, but he may honestly have been drawn to the front also by the deep friendship that he had retained with his former Princeton classmate and roommate, "Light Horse Harry" Lee.

Along with the men, Southside Virginia's wagons, horses, and materiel poured southwest toward the Staunton and Dan River conjunction (near Scottsburg); many were rallied to the cause by Captain John Morton, a founding Trustee of the College. Somewhere in the vicinity of Halifax Court House, President Smith caught up with Captain Morton, and offered his services, but was assured that while any and all of his students over 16 years of age were certainly welcomed, Mr. Smith would be more valuable in the pulpit and classroom as a recruiter than as an officer in the field, and our President reluctantly took his counsel and returned to Hampden-Sydney.

V. "The British Are Coming!"

Yes, finally they came. They really did. They came in the person of one Lieutenant Colonel Banastre Tarleton, by all counts the single most ruthless officer in all of the Cornwallis forces. Colonel Tarleton was a cavalry commander; his men were called "dragoons," and Tarleton's dragoons wore green-coats, rather than red. He was sometimes called "Tarleton the Butcher" and "Bloody Ban." Colonists were wont to mispronounce his name intentionally, dubbing "Banastre" as "Be Nasty" Tarleton. It was a reputation that he had acquired in May of 1780, at the Battle of the Waxhaws (along the NC-SC line, just southwest of present-day Monroe), where one of the major motivational cries of the Revolution originated: "Quarters," or more specifically "Tarleton's Quarters." The Oxford English Dictionary gives as definition # 23 for "quarters," "the granting of leniency in military battle." When the colonial forces at the Waxhaws were surrounded, they threw down their military arms and threw up their own arms, and called out, "Quarters! Quarters!" meaning, "No more! We surrender!" While they were doing this, in a time where "gentlemanly rules" were still almost always followed, Colonel Tarleton ordered that his Greencoats run many of the surrenderers through with their swords and sabers. Tarleton's Legion may have butchered as many as 300 surrendering Carolinians at the Waxhaws that terrible day. It was a military atrocity that profoundly influenced one 13-year-old neighborhood boy who was beholding it all and even getting a facial saber wound himself—a tall youngster named Andrew Jackson. "Tarleton's Quarters!" thereafter became a by-word of revenge for the colonists in the Carolinas, meaning "the kind of mercy Tarleton gives," and sure enough, when the fortunes of war were reversed at King's Mountain, in October of 1780, colonial militiamen and regular Continental Army men killed a number of British who were already in the act of surrendering, shouting as they did so, "Tarleton's Quarters!"

John Blair Smith, second president and leader of the troops

Colonel Tarleton was also a notorious civilian raider. His characteristic tactic was to ride onto a plantation with his men, round up all the livestock into the barn (and sometimes even their slaves) and then set that barn on fire. He was a cocky redhead, and a florid-faced man and some folks said that the identifying color was no less than the Satanic "mark of the beast." Even his own men hated and feared him, and frequently brought charges against him, or else tried to transfer out of his command. Once in later years, back in England, when Tarleton was reflecting on his wartime service in the Atlantic colonies, he boasted that he had "killed more men and ravished more women than any man in America." In upland South Carolina during the Revolution, the colonel's scary name was used by colonial parents in "Boogey-Man" fashion to straighten up the behavior of their restless children, especially at bedtime: "Now you be good, else Tarleton will get you!"

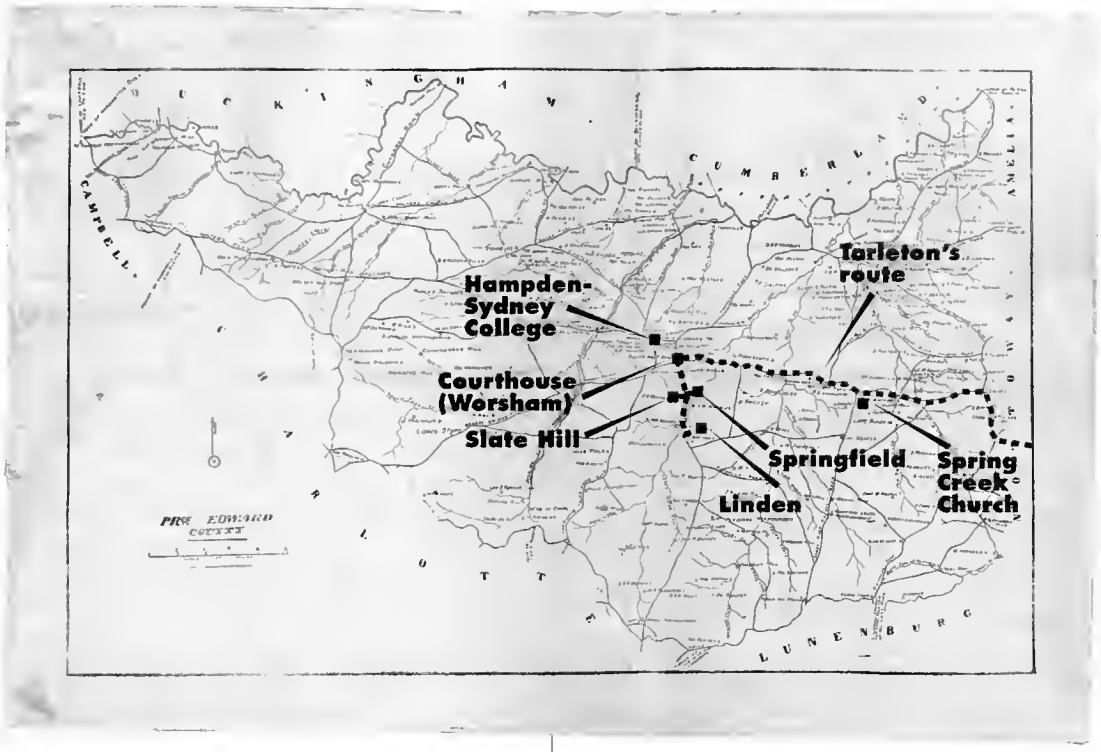
In the late spring of 1781, Cornwallis turned Tarleton's Legion loose to go after Jefferson and the Assembly in Charlottesville, where they had regathered after abandoning vulnerable Richmond. As all native Virginians should know, this was the famous occasion on the first weekend of June 1781, when young John Jouett at Cuckoo Tavern in Louisa County saw the entire body of Tarleton's Legion ride by late at night, whereupon he rode all night by short-cut backroads and got to Charlottesville just in time to warn the principals to evacuate. Governor Jefferson's term had technically ended that Saturday, and after a Sabbath-day rest, the Assembly was supposed to have elected a new governor. But on that appointed Monday they were all fleeing for their lives to Staunton and elsewhere, leaving Virginia with no governor at all. In the ensuing chaos, Patrick Henry suggested that George Washington name a dictator, namely Mr. Henry, for Virginia; the very sound of the name and notion, "dictator," was absolute anathema to Jefferson, and Henry's incidental remark earned Jefferson's undying hatred of our famous college trustee.

If Tarleton had ridden faster that weekend, or if John Jouett had ridden more slowly, Tarleton would have bagged the greatest single bounty of the Revolution—the Declaration's author and no less than three of its signers!—that Monday morning, June 4, 1781. As it was, he returned to the Richmond-Petersburg area, and Cornwallis gave up his infantry chase, with the entire army retreating to the lower Peninsula.

Because there were some Tories in this area, General Cornwallis knew that the Prince Edward County Court House held quartermaster supplies of food and a small munitions factory. On July 9, 1781, Cornwallis again set loose Colonel Tarleton to wage war on these inland supply depots. By then, however, everything in the Amelia and Prince Edward centers seems to have been moved to hiding places farther west. Thus when the Butcher got here on July 13, 1781, the larder was bare, or almost so.

Colonel Tarleton came into the nearby Court House village from the direction of Burke's Tavern (a striking colonial-era building that is still standing just off US 360 at present-day Burkeville). His riders came across by way of Sandy Creek Baptist Church and then along a part of the Green Bay Road, toward Leigh's Mountain, and then across Briery Creek, and uphill behind the Worsham Exxon. The last portion of that road, uphill from Briery Creek and into the Court House, was then called "Gallows Road," because the county's execution gallows was a permanent structure, just outside the village's corporate limits to the east.

Either en route to town or in departure therefrom, the Greencoats passed by the plantation home of Archibald McRobert, a onetime Anglican rector who in his political conversion to colonial republicanism had also abandoned his Anglican ordination and had become a Presbyterian cleric. He was also an early trustee of this College. According to one version of the story, the Legion set fire to his house, but as the horsemen rode away, a sudden summer shower arose and put out the fire. In gratitude for his home's deliverance through this well-timed, allegedly divinely-inspired, intrusion, the Rev. Archibald McRobert then re-named his plantation house, "Providence." In truth, though, another version of the story rebuffs that romantic version, noting that the "Providence" name was being used several years before



John Wood's 1820 map of Prince Edward County, with an overlay showing the route taken by General Tarleton in 1781. (The County changed hardly more in the 180 years since this map was drawn than it had in the 50 years since the Revolution. Many families still live where their ancestors' homes are noted here.)

this raid. During Dr. Eggleston's tenure as College President (1919-1939), he had one of the three historic signs at Worsham inscribed with that story, however, and he also arranged for Mr. McRobert's reburial in the College Church Cemetery.

When they found no quartermaster and commissary supplies in the village, Tarleton's Legion looked for something to burn or to pillage—anything simply to make their southside Virginia jaunt worthwhile. According to some stories, the frustrated cavalrymen trashed both Springfield and Linden Plantations south of town (Linden was owned for many years by the now-retired Hampden-Sydney professor Bob Rogers and his wife Gretchen; it is presently owned by another religion department professor, John David Ramsey).

In this immediate area the largest supplier of food for the Continental Army and the Virginia state militia units was Hampden-Sydney's founding trustee, Nathaniel Venable. Tarleton and his staff rode to Slate Hill, where Mrs. Venable met them—maybe just outside the plantation office that is now known as "The Birthplace" of Hampden-Sydney College. Mr. Venable had either been "warned by God in a dream," as we preachers are wont to say, or (more likely) informed by patriot outriders ahead of the Tarleton pack, and he had long since gone somewhere else. Colonel Tarleton knew of Venable's rebel reputation, and he asked his wife where her husband was. She is supposed to have said that she would not tell him, and she dared him to shoot her, saying, "My husband is worth more to my country alive than I am dead." No one harmed her.

While this was going on there were numerous hogsheads stacked up in front of the barn. One cannot imagine soldiers not breaking open these hogsheads in order to steal the cured tobacco that was supposedly therein. But for some reason Tarleton's raiders did not think to break open even one. If they had, they would have discovered many of the missing military supplies stored inside these big barrels. On this occasion, being in plain sight was their saving grace, and thus the supplies were saved.

And now we come to the mystery. Since Tarleton was such a morally reprehensible person, and since we know that he and his horsemen plundered property to the east and south of the courthouse, why do you suppose that, insofar as we know, there was no move for this Assyrian to come down like a wolf on the fold of this little college village just a bit over a mile away to the west, especially if the loyalist Tories in this area had indicated that this collection of buildings over here (one of which was a rather noteworthy three-story brick one, by far the largest building in this area of Virginia) was actually named for two anti-Royalist enthusiasts of a previous century, and had been founded by a son-in-law of a signer of the Declaration of Independence? Of course we did not have the public signage that we have today, but the named place was certainly known all through these parts, and it is almost inconceivable to me that such a slashing, burning villain would have left us alone. Earlier in the war, other British soldiers had burned much of Nassau Hall, at signer Witherspoon's College of New Jersey at Princeton; how could Hampden-Sydney have escaped Tarleton's wrath, especially since he gave no quarter, even to women and children?

Patrick Henry, governor of Virginia and trustee of Hampden-Sydney College.

Professor Bob Rogers helps students seek the "enduring moral message"

The Holocaust

By Peter Davies

JUST WEEKS BEFORE THE LAST day of classes, twelve seniors sat around a seminar table sharing their research papers. Instead of thinking about graduation parties or their future plans, they were discussing topics like "Survivor Guilt" and the "History of Auschwitz."

Welcome to the Holocaust Seminar, subtitled Contemporary Perspectives on Meaning, taught by Professor Emeritus of Religion Dr. Bob Rogers. For the past four years, Dr. Rogers has taught this seminar to juniors and seniors from any major who are interested in learning more about the 20th century's greatest atrocity. They tackle such ponderous questions as "How could the world have permitted it to happen?" and "How can we live with the memory of such an atrocity?"

"I'm trying to increase their awareness of the meaning of the Holocaust," said Dr. Rogers, "not just of the facts." By exposing students to a wide range of materials, from films to plays to personal memoirs, all engendered by the Holocaust, he hopes to broaden their perspective and force them to confront the profound moral and theological issues left in the Holocaust's wake. "I view this as a personal transformation journey," he said, "I'm convinced that every student who goes through this course will be changed and will make a difference in his community."

Since the students largely, if not exclusively, come from Christian backgrounds, Dr. Rogers also aims to help them understand the perspective of "being in the minority position and understanding the other." If they begin to understand the lessons of the Holocaust, they can learn "what hatred can produce when allowed to go unchecked."

While Dr. Rogers' professional interest stems from his years teaching about Judaism and biblical Hebrew, he makes it clear that this is not just a religion course, although the students will learn about Jewish history and beliefs. In fact, it is truly an interdisciplinary course. Throughout the semester, Dr. Rogers draws on a wide range of his colleagues, using both their professional and personal interests, to open up the classroom to the broadest spectrum of ideas and perspectives.

When discussing Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Dr. Rogers invited Dr. Owen Norment, Professor Emeritus of Religion, to return to campus and share his interest in the martyred German theologian. Dr. Norment explained how Bonhoeffer struggled with the passivity of his Lutheran church toward Hitler's anti-semitism. Eventually, Bonhoeffer's resistance landed him in a German prison, where he was executed in April of 1945 for participating in a conspiracy to assassinate Hitler.

Dr. Joan McRae (French) led the class through an overview of anti-semitism, including a tour through the darker regions of the internet and some of the websites devoted to denying that the Holocaust ever happened. In keeping with this interdisciplinary theme, Dr. Kathy Weese (English) discussed the film Europa, Europa and the efforts to forge a Jewish identity, while Dr. Sarah Hardy (English) led a class devoted to Art Spiegelman's Maus, a graphic novel depicting his father's Holocaust experiences and the burden of living with a horrific past. Professor Shirley Kagan (fine arts) continued the examination of this theme by looking at two plays, The Deputy by Rol Hochhuth and The Substance of Fire by Jon Robin Baitz.

The class then traveled to Richmond for a tour of the Virginia Holocaust Museum led by Jay Ipson, one of the museum's founders and a survivor of Nazi Germany. This personalized exposure to the ramifications of the Holocaust continued when three Jewish Hampden-Sydney professors conducted a free-flowing discussion of how their families and their beliefs have been affected by events nearly 60 years ago. Saranna Thornton (economics), Steve Bloom (physics), and Shirley Kagan entertained a wide range of questions from the students, such as "Do you hold the German people responsible?" and "What do you think of the revisionists?"

Just as the students were encouraged to be candid in their questions, the faculty members gave equally honest answers as they expressed both their academic and their personal beliefs. Because of their varied backgrounds, all of them had learned about the Holocaust in different ways. Dr. Bloom's family never talked about it until his twin brother began researching their family history as part of a school project. For Professor Kagan, who grew up in Israel, the Holocaust was always a vivid presence, both in her family and in the culture around her. She also grew up with little exposure to Christianity before moving to England at age seven. This is in sharp contrast to living in southside Virginia, where the nearest synagogue is an hour's drive away.

In addition to incorporating many different perspectives into the seminar, Dr. Rogers has ensured that his course also incorporates the latest teaching technology. Using the Blackboard software that all students have access to, and the assistance of Chandra Gigliotti-Guridi, public services librarian, he is able to post course materials, updates, and even links to helpful websites. In addition, students can exchange ideas and even paper drafts with one another at any time of day.

The final two class sessions were given over to student presentations of their semester-long research projects. In treating this course like an advanced seminar, Dr. Rogers expected his students to produce an extensive essay on a Holocaust topic of their own choosing. Since most of the students were not religion majors, he actively encouraged them to draw on their own disciplinary knowledge, be it economics, history, or even science. This year, the range of topics included the workings of Nazi propaganda, post-Holocaust survivor guilt, Nazi medical experiments, and the largely unknown story of a Japanese diplomat who saved hundreds, if not thousands, of Polish Jews. As related by Chris Miller '01, Chiune Sugihara was working in the Japanese consulate in Lithuania in 1940 when Jewish refugees arriving from Poland began asking for transit visas so they could escape from Europe. All western escape routes were closed and the Nazis were fast encroaching on the Soviet Union, thus the refugees hoped that by crossing Siberia into Japan, they could eventually reach a safe haven. Although not authorized to do so by his government, Sugihara wrote as many as 300 visas in a single day. It is estimated that 40,000 survivors and their descendents are alive today because of Sugihara's assistance.

In his presentation, Evan Smith '01 discussed the gruesome medical experiments that Nazi scientists conducted on prisoners, often testing the limits of human endurance to extreme temperatures and high altitudes. As a biology and religion major, Smith was struck by what he called "the ridiculous distortion of medical research" done by Joseph Mengele and other German doctors.

Under the title "Surrender to the Irrational," Chris Richards '01 examined the means by which Joseph Goebbels and other Nazi propagandists stirred up anti-semitism in the German people. Using a laptop Powerpoint presentation, Richards showed examples of the Nazi artwork that lead to events like Kristallnacht ("Night of Broken Glass").

In the final class session, Dr. Rogers spoke for a few minutes about why he teaches this class. First off, he said, "I enjoy teaching about the Holocaust. But furthermore, I consider it a mitzvah, or commandment." He believes the Holocaust contains an "enduring moral message" that each generation of students needs to understand. Dr. Rogers then related his own exposure to the lessons of the Holocaust: as a young graduate student at Boston University, he lived for several years as the building superintendent of the Hillel house, the Jewish student center. After learning from the Jewish students and hearing survivor stories, he felt a need to provide teaching settings where Christians and Jews could come together. Over the years of teaching Judaism and Biblical Hebrew at Hampden-Sydney, he began touching on the Holocaust and the students kept asking for more. Now, four years after first teaching this seminar, and one year after officially retiring from the College, Dr. Rogers says he will back next year to teach it again. It's his new mitzvah.

"I'm trying to increase their awareness of the meaning of the Holocaust, not just of the facts."

Graced with blue skies and a gentle spring breeze, Venable lawn played host to this year's Commencement exercises on May 13, marking the conclusion of Hampden-Sydney College's 225th academic year. One hundred eighty-three students received degrees.

Dr. Walter Bortz addressed his first graduating class as President of the College, thanking the group for the part they played in his "freshman year" at Hampden-Sydney. "You were good tutors, and I have been honored to have you be my leaders," President Bortz said. "I hope I have proven a worthy pupil."

Dr. Douglas W. Foard, Executive Secretary of the Phi Beta Kappa Society, gave the Commencement address. Dr. Foard attended Randolph Macon when it too was an all-male school and reveled in the opportunity to address an entire graduating class as "gentlemen." "My classmates and I were often addressed as 'gentlemen,' although we rarely merited that description (with the exceptions, of course, of Professors Lane and Tucker who now serve on your faculty)," Dr. Foard said jokingly.

Foard also commented on the "rueful" increase of technical training classes in American higher education and celebrated the increasingly rare liberal arts experience enjoyed by Hampden-Sydney College students. Liberal education, Dr. Foard told the graduates, is the "best collateral we have to secure our future." Following his address, he received a Doctor of Humane Letters degree.

Dr. Edwin Lawrence Kendig, Jr., '32 was also given an honorary degree. Dr. Kendig's lifetime of work within the medical field has earned him a position as the world's foremost authority in pediatric pulmonology, for which he received a Doctor of Science degree from the College thirty years ago. This year he received a Doctor of Letters degree for dedicated service to his fellow man.

The valedictorian was Kristian Hargadon of Powhatan. He graduated summa cum laude with honors in biology. Mr. Hargadon also received the Samuel S. Jones Phi Beta Kappa Award for intellectual excellence.

The Gammon Cup, given annually to the graduate who has best served the College by his character, scholarship, and athletic ability, was presented to Huston D. Green.

Michael H. Blackwell and Leland C. Rice received the Anna Carrington Harrison Award, recognizing the most constructive student leadership during the year.

The Cabell Award for distinguished teaching went to Dr. Kevin Dunn, professor of chemistry. Staff member Florence Watson, in recognition of her active service to the College and her ideals, won the Robert Thruston Hubard IV Award. Dr. Alexander J. Worth, Elliott Associate Professor of Biology, received the Thomas Edward Crawley Award for his devoted service to educating students of the College.

The Fuqua awards, annually recognizing five superior classroom teachers selected by the members of the previous two graduating classes, went to Shirley Kagan, assistant professor of fine arts, Dr. Amos Lee Laine, Trinkle Professor of History, Dr. Joan E. McRae, assistant professor of modern languages, Dr. Daniel G. Mossler, Elliot Associate Professor of Psychology, and Dr. James F. Pontuso, Elliot Professor of Political Science.

Henry H. McVey III '57 of Richmond and Bennett White of the graduating class were given Algernon Sydney Sullivan medallions in honor of their efforts to preserve the College's high standard of morals.

The Senior Award, recognizing the person who, in the eyes of the senior class, has most significantly influenced the College during their four years, was given to Lt. General Samuel V. Wilson, President Emeritus.

Edwin Lawrence Kendig, Jr., M.D. '32 (left, with President Bortz) received an honorary degree for his groundbreaking work in pediatric pulmonology.

Modern technology invades even the hallowed lawns of Venable Hall.

André Sessoms receives his bars from his mother and grandmother after being commissioned an officer in the United States Army.

Biology major and Goldwater Scholar Kristian Hargadon was the valedictorian.

PATRICIA CORMIER
President of Longwood College, to those who fought the fire

Alumnus leads fight in Longwood fire

On April 24, Longwood College was the unfortunate host to the most dramatic fire in Farmville's recent history. Over 11 fire departments and 175 firefighters battled the blaze that destroyed Longwood's most storied piece of architecture, the Rotunda. Leading the coordinated firefighting effort was the Chief of Farmville's Volunteer Fire Department, Tim McKay '96.

McKay was a member of Hampden-Sydney's Volunteer Fire Department all four years as a student and was Fire Chief his senior year. After graduation, McKay spent a year training to become a State Trooper. Following this hiatus he returned to Farmville to become involved in the town's volunteer fire fighting efforts.

Hampden-Sydney's Fire Department helped in the battle against the Longwood fire and, because McKay was in charge of the coordinated effort, he once again found himself heading up the College's student firefighters. "They were a blessing," McKay said of the Hampden-Sydney volunteers. "They made me proud."

In addition to the Rotunda, the fire destroyed East and West Ruffners; all three buildings were undergoing full renovations at the time. A major portion of Grainger Hall, which housed recently installed computerized classrooms, was also severely damaged. The firefighters successfully prevented the flames from spreading to nearby dorms. No one was seriously injured.

McKay, alongside Brian Smith '01, Hampden-Sydney's Fire Chief, recently accepted Longwood College's Presidential Distinguished Service Award on behalf of his department.

Presentation offers a peak into the future face of the campus

On May 3, after months of discussion about the planning and design of a new library, fine arts center, and student services center, members of the Hampden-Sydney community were given a chance to view a design model of the proposed changes to the College's physical layout.

Fred Cox of Marcellus, Wright, Cox & Smith, the Richmond-based architects hired to prepare the model, explained that the fine arts center will likely be four stories and house a three-hundred seat theater with an additional one-hundred seat studio theater.

What is now Eggleston Library will be transformed into a student services center consolidating many of the activities and services central to student life. The new library, scaled at around 90,000 square feet, is to be positioned slightly behind Winston Hall, on the site of what are now the Blake offices and apartments. It will feature three above ground levels and will be geared to handle the College's technological needs.

In addition to discussing how this model will serve future campus needs, the architects emphasized the aesthetic quality of the new buildings. Junior architect Dennis Craig commented, based on his experience in open meetings earlier in the year, that Hampden-Sydney students have a "profound appreciation for traditional architecture." It is appropriate, then, that the new Master Plan strives to preserve architectural consistency and enhance the subtle yet elegant landscape of the campus.

The Hampden-Sydney volunteer Fire Department, on which many students and staffers serve, was instrumental in fighting the fire that ravaged Longwood College's historic Rotunda complex in April (right). Among the firefighters honored after the fire was Tim McKay '96 (above, at right, with Longwood president Patricia Cormier), captain of the Farmville Volunteer Fire department and the officer in charge of directing all the 11 companies that responded to the alarm.

The family of the late Philip Rome '68, one of this year's recipients of the James J. Keating Medallion, attended Founders Weekend to accept the award on Rome's behalf. Present were (from left) Jim Bettis, Jennifer Rome Bettis, Vivian Rome, Joanne Bowen, and Andrew Rome.

Founders Weekend at The Greenbrier

On March 30, the Society of Founders held its annual spring weekend event at the Greenbrier Hotel. Before the traditional Founders Dinner, guests gathered to witness "A Glimpse of the Future," a presentation of design models and concepts for Hampden-Sydney's new library, fine arts center, and student services center.

The Keating Medallion, established in 1986 by James J. Keating '56, is awarded each year in recognition of outstanding service and devotion to the College. This year the award was presented by Johnny C. Ellis '70 to W. Birch Douglass III '65 and the late Philip deButts Rome '68.

Douglass was first elected to the Board of Trustees in 1991. His second term, during which he served as Vice Chairman of the Board, concluded this year. He served on two major committees of the Campaign to Sustain the Mission and has spearheaded several other committees as a Trustee.

"His quiet leadership has been one of the keys to Hampden-Sydney College's success over the last three decades," Ellis said of Douglass, noting specifically his hand in the fruitful presidential search that resulted in the appointment of Walter M. Bortz III.

Philip Rome, who died on December 26, 2000, was elected a member of the Board of Trustees last year. In his years of distinguished service to the College, Rome served as President of the Richmond Alumni Club, President of the Hampden-Sydney College Alumni Club, and a key member of the Football Commission.

"Other alumni have devoted much time to building up Hampden-Sydney," Ellis said of Rome, "but I am confident that there are none who loved our College more." Rome's wife Vivian accepted the Keating Medallion on his behalf.

At this year's final convocation, chemistry major Nate Stasko '02 received the Topham Chemistry Award. The award was established in the spring of 2000 in memory of the late Richard W. Topham, Ph. D. '65, a chemistry graduate and later chairman of the Chemistry Department at the University of Richmond. Present at the awards ceremony were (from left) Adele Topham, Nate, Will Topham, Richard Giles, M.D., '65, and Virginia Topham.

HAMPDEN-SYDNEY COLLEGE HABITAT PROJECT

Build a house, build community.

The Hampden-Sydney College community, in conjunction with the Farmville chapter of Habitat for Humanity and College Church, will build a Habitat House on campus this fall. While preliminary arrangements and fundraising are already underway, construction is scheduled to begin on Thursday, September 27, with a round-the-clock "blitz build." Once completed, the house will be transported to its permanent site in Farmville by flatbed truck.

The idea for this project began with President Walter M. Bortz III, who said, "The Habitat for Humanity Project is a great way to put the Hampden-Sydney ideals of community service into action. Our students will have the concrete satisfaction of building a better life for one local family."

Students from a wide range of student organizations are expected to help, with Chad Krouse '02, Student Body President, and Judson Root '03 heading the effort. Student volunteer teams from fraternities and residence halls, along with families, alumni, faculty, and staff will do the actual construction. The blitz build, akin to a good old-fashioned "barn raising," will take place on Family Weekend, so parents and siblings of students can also participate.

The blitz build will end on the evening of Friday, September 28. During the following two weeks, work on the interior of the house will continue. The move to the permanent site is planned for Saturday, October 13, during Homecoming, so returning alumni can share in the project.

The grassy area beside Atkinson Hall, in front of the cemetery on College Road, is the scheduled construction site. The house will be built on pillars in two modular pieces, each 42' x 12', with the two sections facing each other in order to assure wall, plumbing, and electrical alignment.

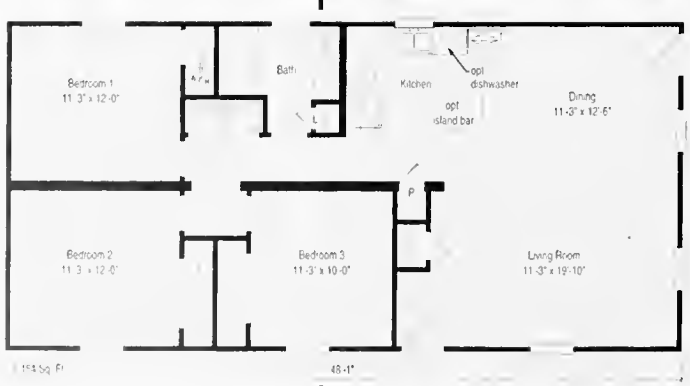
After delivery to the permanent site, a finishing crew will join the two modular sections, complete the system connections, and finish the roofing. The house is scheduled to be ready for its new owners before Thanksgiving.

Now celebrating its twenty-fifth anniversary, Habitat for Humanity International, a non-profit, non-denominational Christian housing organization, has built more than 100,000 houses in 2,000 communities in more than 60 countries.

Families helped by Habitat for Humanity are chosen on the basis of their need and their willingness to work in partnership with the organization. The houses are sold to the families at cost and with interest-free mortgages.

Those behind the Hampden-Sydney project plan for it to be a true community effort, with students, families, faculty, and staff working together to build a needed home. It will also provide further evidence that "good men and good citizens" are plentiful at Hampden-Sydney.

Current plans call for the Hampden-Sydney College Habitat house to look similar to the model below— 42' x 24', with three bedrooms, bath, living room, combination dining room-kitchen, and laundry area.



Contributions of both labor and money are needed to complete this project successfully.

Please contact Candy Dowdy at (434) 223-6274, or cdowdy@hsc.edu for more information on how you can participate. You may also mail your name, address, and phone number, to Hampden-Sydney College, HABITAT HOUSE PROJECT, Box 128, Hampden-Sydney, VA 23943.

THE RECORD OF HAMPDEN-SYDNEY COLLEGE

Summer 2001

The Retirement of Mayo, Turney, and Jagasich

This spring, Hampden-Sydney College formally said farewell to three veteran professors: Dr. Thomas T. Mayo IV, professor of mathematics and computer science, Dr. Tully H. Turney, Jr., professor of biology, and Dr. Paul A. Jagasich, professor of modern languages. While they represent three different disciplines, three different teaching styles, and three different personalities, they have each been an integral part of the College, both in and out of the classroom.

THE VETERAN PROFESSOR OF the group, Tom Mayo has been teaching at Hampden-Sydney since 1962. Originally recruited for the physics department, he eventually became a mathematics professor as the College's needs shifted. "I think I've taught more courses here than anybody," he said, citing a list of nearly 30 courses, ranging from Astronomy and Quantum Mechanics to Differential Geometry and Statistics.

"Maybe I should have been an applied mathematician to begin with," Dr. Mayo said. But VMI, where he earned his B.S. degree, did not have a mathematics major at the time so he pursued physics, continuing on to the University of Virginia for his doctorate.

In the mid-80s, the opportunity arose to teach math at Hampden-Sydney after several members of the department departed. Instead of just teaching a few math courses, Dr. Mayo became a full-fledged member of the math department. "In a sense, I corrected that mistake of long ago, in my undergraduate days, and became a mathematician," he commented. "Actually, theoretical physics is applied mathematics."

This department switch also gave Dr. Mayo the chance to teach an even broader range of courses, such as Mathematics for Economics and Introduction to Computing. "The best way to learn something new is to teach it," he said.

In addition to his pedagogical flexibility, Dr. Mayo has also served the College in a number of administrative capacities, most notably serving as registrar and various forms of academic dean, beginning as assistant academic dean in 1971 and becoming acting academic dean in 1975 and 1976. From 1993-1997, he served as associate dean of the faculty. Dr. Mayo also chaired the academic affairs, faculty affairs, and professional development committees and participated in two presidential searches.

When Dr. Mayo first arrived at Hampden-Sydney to teach physics, it was, as he terms it, "the post-Sputnik era" and the College had lots of ambitious and talented science students who were preparing for graduate school. After his years in administration, during which he was largely teaching only half-time, Dr. Mayo noticed that the physics department did not have the same number of serious science students. There were still some excellent students, but far fewer of them. Sensing that the physics department was overstaffed, he volunteered to teach some math courses, which in turn led to becoming a member of the math department and a belated mathematician. "I'd like to thank Hampden-Sydney for giving me the opportunity to change jobs every six or seven years," Dr. Mayo said, "allowing me to be the dilettante that I've always been."

While he has enjoyed playing a vital role in the administration of the College, Dr. Mayo remains a teacher at heart, no matter which of his many courses he's teaching: "There's nothing like the psychic pay you get when a student comes back and says 'you made a difference in my life'."

He won't miss the classroom for long however—Dr. Mayo plans to return next fall and teach part-time. He and his wife E. A., who is also retiring after working for years as a cataloguing assistant in Eggleston Library, have no plans to retire from the Hampden-Sydney community. She was born and raised in Farmville, while he originally hails from Radford. "At this point, we have no other home," Dr. Mayo said. Thus they will continue singing in the College Church choir, attending basketball games, and befriending new generations of students. "We'll have even more time now to participate in the community."

TULLY TURNEY ARRIVED HERE in 1965 to help set up the molecular biology program. The following year the department chair left Hampden-Sydney, so Dr. Turney, as an assistant professor, found himself appointed chairman, a position he held for 17 years. "At the time," he recalled, "biology was the weakest of the science departments." It had been designed primarily to serve pre-medical students so Dr. Turney worked to make it into an independent, viable discipline. He supervised the hiring of faculty and the development of a broader curriculum, including ecology and genetics. The number of majors increased greatly until biology was one of the largest departments on campus, sending many students on to graduate and medical schools.

Dr. Turney came to Hampden-Sydney via Oberlin College and the University of North Carolina, where he earned his doctorate in zoology and biochemistry. He also did postdoctoral work at the Oak Ridge National Laboratory. Throughout the years, Dr. Turney has taught a wide range of courses, from Introductory Biology to Bioethics and Invertebrate Physiology. He also published a general biology textbook.

After stepping down as department chair in the early 80s, Dr. Turney devoted himself to the burgeoning field of electronic teaching. An early fan of the Apple computer, he put all his course materials on the HyperCard system. This often required him to teach his students how to use a computer. Once he'd mastered it, however, one student commented "that it was like having your own private tutor." Dr. Turney believes the standard textbook, including the one he wrote, is dead. "Biology is a kinetic science," he said, and requires animated, electronic teaching methods.

Because of this longstanding interest in instructional technology, Dr. Turney has thought deeply about the status of the liberal arts college in the Internet age. In general, he foresees a rocky future, as economics will cause more students to accept the cheaper option of distance learning from a few major, nationally-known institutions. In science, the liberal arts college also faces the challenge of equipping increasingly expensive laboratories. "When I started," Dr. Turney recalled, "we were able to fully equip our lab with research quality equipment for $18,000. That won't even buy one piece of equipment today." He believes that Hampden-Sydney will have to adapt to these changes: "The faster we get into teaching on-line, the better."

In retirement, Dr. Turney plans to spend time on a few of his many avocations. "I've looked into enough microscopes," he said. He recently bought a grand piano and will devote himself to "getting serious about it," even though he's played nearly his entire life. He will also be found skiing, golfing, and sea kayaking. He is not leaving the classroom entirely however: he will be teaching one biology course at the Fuqua School next year.

BORN IN HUNGARY, DR. PAUL Jagasich has taught at Hampden-Sydney since 1973, focusing primarily on German and Russian but also occasionally offering courses and independent study in French, Spanish, and several other languages, such as Dutch, Czech, and Portugese.

After earning several degrees at Budapest University, he left Hungary in 1964. Because Hungary was under Soviet control, Dr. Jagasich and his wife and infant daughter left overnight with almost none of their possessions, slipping into Switzerland before settling in Italy for a year. They then immigrated to the United States, where he taught high school in New Jersey for two years. From there, Dr. Jagasich earned Master's degrees in both Slavic and French from the University of North Carolina. In 1973, he earned his doctorate, also from the University of North Carolina. Not content with all that, he earned an additional Master's in German from Middlebury College in 1983. "Every language was new when I learned it," Dr. Jagasich recalled. When he left Hungary, he had mastered eight; now he claims he's able to speak 13 Slavic languages and 13 Romance languages.

Dr. Jagasich's most memorable experiences occurred when he and poet-in-residence Tom O'Grady translated several works of the Czech poet Jaroslav Seifert, including The Casting of Bells, Mozart in Prague, and Halley's Comet. In 1984, they went to Prague and, unbeknownst to the Czech and Soviet authorities, smuggled out several Seifert manuscripts for translation. Later that year, when Seifert was awarded the Nobel prize but was too frail to attend (he died two years later), Dr. Jagasich was given the opportunity to attend the award ceremony at the Swedish Academy in Stockholm. He and Professor O'Grady were featured in a People Magazine article titled, "Two James Bonds Score a Major Literary Coup Behind the Iron Curtain." At commencement the following year, he accepted for Seifert an honorary Hampden-Sydney College degree. Vice-president George H. W. Bush, the Commencement speaker, praised Seifert as an example of "liberty's candle." The adventures of Jagasich and O'Grady in Prague were later dramatized in the play The Gardens of November, (written by O'Grady and Joe Robinette) which premiered on campus in 1996.

For eleven years, Dr. Jagasich coached Hampden-Sydney's water polo team, a sport he introduced to the campus in 1978. In 1988, he swam the English Channel, setting the record time for his age-group. His published account of this experience, Two Faces of the English Channel, describes both the technical and emotional challenge of completing the swim. Out of water, Dr. Jagasich is also an accomplished musician. Over the years, he has given numerous cello and voice recitals, many with Drs. Amos Lee Laine and Jim Kidd, for the College community.

Dr. Jagasich and his wife Ea are moving to Georgia to be nearer their daughter and grandson. In his retirement, he plans to write a memoir of his multifaceted life. At a faculty reception honoring his retirement (and that of Drs. Mayo and Turney), Dr. Susan Smith, chair of the modern languages department, said, "The third floor of Bagby Hall won't be the same. He greets each of us in our own tongue, then breaks into a tongue none of us know." When Dr. Jagasich got up to speak, he said he would like to be remembered simply as "Paul Jagasich, polymath."

Two Hampden-Sydney Alumni Return to the Classroom

FOR MOST STUDENTS AND alumni, the Hampden-Sydney classroom is experienced from only one perspective: attentively soaking up the wisdom and occasional wit of the illustrious faculty. Standing in front of the class is an experience reserved for the required oral presentation and even then best accompanied by a well-prepared classmate. Most students are not subsequently inspired to spend their lives in front of the class. Two alumni, however, have returned to the Hampden-Sydney classroom to share their own wisdom and wit with a new generation of attentive students.

"Can you go home again or not?" Justin Isaacs '95 wondered this when Dr. Ken Townsend, chair of the Hampden-Sydney's economics department, called to offer him a teaching position. "I was very, very nervous," he recalled. A graduate student at Auburn University at the time, Isaacs was still working on his dissertation and was not sure whether he wanted to teach or go into the private sector.

He decided to come home, however, first for a one-year position and now as a tenure-track assistant professor. Because he went straight to graduate school and returned to Hampden-Sydney only four years later, Dr. Isaacs (he has since earned his doctorate) was nervous about becoming a colleague of the professors who had only recently been his mentors. "It took me a while," he recalled, "to call them by their first names. There are still some faculty members, like John Brinkley or Hassell Simpson, who will always be Mr. Brinkley or Dr. Simpson." This adjustment cut both ways: "It may have been harder for some of the faculty to realize that I was no longer their student."

Dr. Isaacs primarily teaches economic development, industrial organization, introduction to economics, and macroeconomics. "I love to teach," he said; "I don't really have a favorite course." Next spring he will introduce a course, Sports and Economics, which he first developed at Auburn. "We will talk about labor economics (such as free agency and salary caps), industrial relations, and public policy (such as public financing of stadiums)." His academic focus is on industrial organization; his dissertation analyzed the electric utility industry. "By my senior year, I knew I was going to graduate school. Once the professors here realized this, they helped prepare me," Dr. Isaacs said. He credits Hampden-Sydney's emphasis on rhetoric and disciplined study skills for giving him an advantage in graduate school. "I have a great department," he said. "They love working with students, but are also very research-oriented."

With his undergraduate years fresh in his memory, Dr. Isaacs knows exactly what his students are experiencing. "I can tailor examples to fit their interests," he said, a big advantage in teaching. On the other hand, "I also know exactly what they've been doing over the weekend." While he wants to be approachable to his students, he is well aware that he is now standing on the other side of the lectern. Even though he may still look like a student to some of the older faculty members, he has no desire to act like one. Out of the classroom, he has been helping coach the soccer team and serving as the advisor to Sigma Nu.

To a greater degree than his non-alumni colleagues, he feels a personal investment in a Hampden-Sydney' College education. "I'm protecting the value of my own degree," he said of his concern with producing only well-prepared graduates.

Returning to Hampden-Sydney has given him a renewed admiration for his colleagues. By attending the Philosophy of Science reading group and the Western Culture seminar, he has seen just how knowledgeable they are. In many ways, he is still here at Hampden-Sydney to learn: "I wonder if all the students have as much respect for the faculty as I do."

WARNER WINBORNE '88 ALSO returned to Hampden-Sydney in the fall of 1999, joining the political science department and revisiting the scene of his college years. "Looking out over the classroom can be a little surreal," he said. "I sometimes see 25 versions of me 15 years ago."

When he arrived here as an undergraduate, Warner Winborne intended to become a lawyer. At graduation, however, the history and political science major realized he was not ready for law school, so he headed west. After spending the summer working in the Rockies, he returned to Richmond and put his radio-ready voice to work as a disc jockey for a jazz station. "I believe," he said, "that I am the first Hampden-Sydney WWHS disc jockey ever to go professional."

After realizing that radio, specifically the morning-drive time slot, was not going to be his future, Dr. Winborne moved to D.C. and began working for a law firm. He enjoyed preparing evidence and doing investigative work, but discovered that he did not want to be a lawyer or lead a lawyer's lifestyle. "I wanted the opportunity to think about what I read, and to share what I read with people who are thoughtful," he said. Thus, he began graduate school at Northern Illinois University, the alma mater of Dr. David Marion.

This past December, he defended his dissertation, Modernization and Modernity: Thomas Hobbes, Adam Smith, and Political Development, an examination of third-world modernization and the history of political thought. This May, he formally became Dr. Winborne. Two days later, he departed for Europe to help lead a group of May Term students through France, Belgium, and Switzerland.

At Hampden-Sydney, Dr. Winborne teaches primarily American Government and other introductory political science courses. Having taught at Northern Illinois, a large public university, and at North Park College, a liberal arts college in Chicago, he said, "I'd take Hampden-Sydney students any day."

Being an alumnus has its advantages in the classroom: "I know what they're thinking before they think it...so I can step in and head them off. I may in fact be more demanding than other faculty members...largely because I know what these guys are capable of." He also knows the world many of the students came from. When discussing Tocqueville's critique of urban living, he makes the admittedly "outrageous claim" that Farmville is everything America ought to be and the west end of Richmond is everything it ought not to be.

When asked if things have changed at Hampden-Sydney since he was a student, Dr. Winborne answered with a somewhat tongue-in-cheek illustration: "Look around the next time it rains. You'll see a bunch of Hampden-Sydney men not sensible enough to carry an umbrella or wear a coat. Then think back to our most famous alumnus, William Henry Harrison. Why is he famous? Because he wasn't bright enough to put on a coat for his presidential inauguration speech, he caught pneumonia and was dead thirty days later. Hampden-Sydney men haven't changed in over 150 years."

Even on a physical level, "a lot of things are reassuringly the same," he said. "The slate blackboards are still there, along with the honor code hanging in each classroom." Overall, Dr. Winborne has found his homecoming to be a welcome one: "I'm happier here, with these students, than anywhere else I've taught."

Moving Up the Ranks: Tiger Alumni Coaching Division I Basketball

By Peter Davies

For years, Hampden-Sydney College basketball fans have known that they are blessed with a great coach. After posting his 300th career victory in only his 15th season, Tony Shaver led last year's inexperienced Tigers to the second round of the NCAA Division III tournament, their fifth consecutive tournament appearance.

What many fans may not know is that Coach Shaver's influence extends long after his players have graduated. Three of his former stars, Russell Turner '92, Dee Vick '94, and Ryan Odom '96, are all currently coaching men's basketball at the Division I level. Here are their stories of the ins and outs of being an aspiring young coach in the extremely competitive world of big-time college basketball.

This spring, Russell Turner found out that his gamble paid off. Last summer, he resigned from his assistant coaching job at Wake Forest (where he had been for six seasons) and moved to northern California so that his wife could complete her medical residency program at UC-San Francisco. He planned to continue coaching but he had no real prospects when they moved. After talking to all the area college coaches, Turner took a short-lived job coaching the women's team at UCSF. A few months later, he heard that Stanford was in need of an administrative assistant. "I got lucky," Turner said about spending last season managing the sponsorship deals, team travel, and many other aspects of Stanford's men's basketball team. The big break, however, came this spring, when head coach Mike Montgomery picked Turner to be his third assistant. Thus, in less than a year, Turner went from being a jobless, cross-country transplant to being on the coaching staff of a nationally-ranked program.

Turner's coaching experience began in Rome, Georgia, where he taught and coached for one year after graduation. In 1994, however, the assistant job at Hampden-Sydney opened up and Turner found himself coaching some of his former teammates, such as Dee Vick. The following year Dave Odom (Ryan's father) hired him as the third assistant at Wake Forest. Under a now-rescinded NCAA policy, third assistants were hired at a rock-bottom "restricted earnings" salary. Thus, for his first three years at Wake Forest, Turner was truly coaching for the love of the game.

While leaving Wake Forest was a tough decision, Turner couldn't be happier with how things have turned out. As he said, "I never would have imagined that I'd be coaching at Wake Forest, I never would have imagined I'd leave Wake Forest without a job, and I certainly never imagined I'd be coaching at Stanford." He is excited about coaching at Stanford, a university with a "model athletic program." While the tougher admissions standards can make recruiting more challenging, the overall atmosphere exerts a "positive pressure" on everyone to succeed. Turner is also grateful for having spent last year learning the business of college basketball. While his title was administrative assistant, a previous jobholder had called it "director of marketing and development"—a more accurate title, perhaps, for Turner's role in coordinating Stanford's sponsorship deals, independent fundraising, team travel, and community outreach. A high-profile college basketball program is "like a small business run out of the athletic office."

DEE VICK '94
Assistant coach at University of South Carolina

This year, however, Turner will be back on the court, teaching players the finer points of the game. "I've been around three great coaches," he said, referring to Shaver, Odom, and his current boss Mike Montgomery. "And they're each great for different reasons."

When Turner left for Wake Forest, Dee Vick, having just finished up his four years as a player, was made an offer he couldn't refuse: the chance to be Coach Shaver's new assistant. The two-year team captain was nervous, at first, about coaching players who had been his teammates just a year before. But he stayed for five years, soaking up all he could from Coach Shaver. "My outlook mirrors his," he said; "the core of my understanding of the game comes from Coach Shaver."

From Hampden-Sydney, Vick went on be the third assistant at East Carolina University, where he faced a new set of challenges. Unlike Hampden-Sydney, which has a long tradition of winning, East Carolina was seeking to define itself in Division I basketball. Head Coach Bill Herrion was brought in two years ago to rebuild the program, and he started by hiring a staff of three new assistants, including Vick. This past year they finished up their final season in the Colonial Athletic Association with a record of 14-14. Next year, they'll be joining Conference USA and facing the likes of Cincinnati and the new Rick Pitino-coached Louisville. While facing such powerhouses will be daunting, Vick said the conference's reputation helped in recruiting: "The recruits' eyes light up when they think of playing on ESPN every week."

As the third assistant (a role defined by NCAA regulations), Vick was not allowed to actively recruit. At Hampden-Sydney, he recruited extensively, but most Division I programs do not consider Division III recruiting experience to be equivalent. "I could only go after a certain type of kid," Vick said of his Hampden-Sydney recruiting, "and then we always had to worry whether his family could afford to come here." In Division I, with 13 full scholarships per team, recruiters cast a much wider net, searching for the best talent. One of East Carolina's stars last year was from Argentina.

Dee Vick '94 (in white shirt) when he was the assistant coch at Hampden-Sydney, with Head Coach Tony Shaver (in coat).

After two seasons as third assistant at East Carolina University, Vick is making another step up the professional ladder. University of South Carolina Head Coach Dave Odom, once again turning to Hampden-Sydney stock for quality coaches, has hired Vick as his Special Assistant. In the upcoming season at South Carolina, Vick will help his old teammate's father with various administrative duties, including travel and film exchange.

When asked about the differences between Division I and Division III, Vick answered, "a few inches and about 20 pounds. Otherwise, it's still just basketball." And that, he said, is what keeps him in it: "I love working with the players." He intends to keep coaching at the Division I level for now, hopefully working his way up to a recruiting position. The former psychology major also intends to keep applying what Coach Shaver taught him. "He's a daring, aggressive coach," Vick said. "This year's success shows what type of coach he is."

For Ryan Odom, coaching is a familiar profession: his father, Dave Odom, is a longtime Division I head coach who recently moved from Wake Forest to the University of South Carolina. And his brother Lane coaches at the University of Missouri. Despite this pedigree, Ryan Odom insists that he did not plan on being a coach. "It wasn't the first thing I thought of doing," he said. Right after graduation, he did an internship in banking and realized he didn't like the 9-to-5 office environment. At least with coaching, he was familiar with all that it entailed.

Odom first served as an administrative assistant at the University of South Florida. After one year, he moved up to thitd assistant coach at Furman for the 1997-1999 seasons. Then he landed an assistant job, with recruiting responsibilities, at UNC-Asheville for the 1999-2000 season. Finally, last year he moved to American University in D.C. to coach under former UVA coach Jeff Jones. Despite all his movement, Odom says "I see myself being here for a while." With an entirely new coaching staff, American is at the beginning of a rebuilding process. Next year they are switching from the Colonial Athletic Association into the Patriot League, so Odom will not be facing former teammate (and coach) Dee Vick and East Carolina Universtity again next year (who beat the American Eagles twice last season). The Patriot League has been touted as one of the few remaining bastions of pure sport by noted sportswriter John Feinstein in his book, The Last Amateurs: Playing for Glory and Honor in Division I College Basketball.

The international focus of American University appeals to Odom. Last summer he went on a recruiting trip to Croatia and Lithuania. As both NCAA and NBA fans have witnessed, foreign-born players are coming here to play in increasing numbers. Evaluating these players and convincing the best ones to come to American is a big part of Odom's job. "Recruiting is fun," he said, "it's very competitive."

When he's not on the recruiting trail, Odom coaches the post players at American, a new challenge for someone who played guard in college. Yet as the son of a coach and as a careful student of Tony Shaver, he has lots of basketball knowledge to share with his players. "Coach Shaver's style is different from my dad's," he said. "Shaver plays a faster, more aggressive game." The biggest coaching lesson he learned from Coach Shaver, however, is about preparation: "He was phenomenally prepared. He created game-like situations in practice."

Odom hopes to become a head coach someday, but he's not in any rush. He's seen firsthand the vicissitudes of a coaching career and knows that "there's not just one way to become a head coach."

Spring Sports

By Donnie Turlington, Sports Information Director

Baseball:

The 2001 Hampden-Sydney baseball team completed its winningest season since 1993 with 15 victories. Overall, the team finished at 15-19 and had an ODAC record of 6-10 under second-year coach Todd Lampman '91. The Tigers opened the season with a victory over Florida College in the Apprentice School Tournament. The team then dropped games to Christopher Newport and Apprentice School to finish out the tournament. The team picked up its second victory of the season two days later over Greensboro College.

Hampden-Sydney split a pair of ODAC weekend series over Washington & Lee and Emory & Henry before heading to Florida for a spring break trip in which the team played five games in three days. After dropping its first three contests on the trip (to Hope College, Amherst College, and Salisbury State), the Tigers rallied for consecutive victories over UMass-Boston. At home the Tigers dropped a weekend ODAC series to Eastern Mennonite and lost tough games to in-state foes Mary Washington and Ferrum before hitting their stride. Over the course of the next two weeks, the Tigers made their run, winning seven of nine games, including sweeps of St. Mary's and Guilford and splits with ODAC-rivals Randolph-Macon and Lynchburg.

Neal Herndon '02 led the team in every offensive category for the second straight season, batting .345 with 41 hits, six doubles, three triples, five homers and 33 RBI. Junior pitcher Joe Pozda led the pitching staff with five victories, while junior Josh Vaughan was second on the team with four wins and led the staff with 49 strikeouts. With eight starters returning and a solid nucleus of young pitchers, the 2002 Tigers should be serious ODAC contenders next year.

Golf:

Hampden-Sydney's golf team finished third in the ODAC in 2001. In addition, the Tigers won the Washington & Lee Invitational and finished in fourth-place at the Virginia Intercollegiate Division II and III Golf Championships.

The Tiger golfers were paced by All-ODAC First Team performer Brent Gammon '03, who recorded a season stroke average of 77.0 and registered five top-five finishes in 11 events. He wound up tied for 11th in the ODAC Tournament. Freshman J.B. Richardson earned ODAC All-Tournament honors after finishing tied for sixth-place in the conference championships.

Sophomores Ryan Patterson and Bryce Smith also had solid outings for the Tigers. Patterson finished with a stroke average of 80.0, while Smith ended with an 80.6 stroke average. Junior Marc Hopkins finished strong down the stretch with a 15th-place finish in the ODAC Tournament. The team will return every player in 2002 and will be expected to once again be at the top of the ODAC standings.

Fifty Hampden-Sydney College student-athletes had a grade-point average of 3.25 or higher and were placed on the Old Dominion Athletic Conference All-Academic squad for the 2000-2001 academic year. All eight Tiger athletic teams had at least three representatives on the team.

Neal Herndon '02, Hampden-Sydney's leading hitter, takes a cut.

Huston Green '01 won this year's Gammon Cup for the senior who has best served the College through his character, scholarship, and athletic ability.

Lacrosse:
Head Coach Ray Rostan was named the 2001 Old Dominion Athletic Conference Men's Lacrosse Coach of the Year, the fourth time he has been honored with the award. Rostan guided the Tigers to an 11-4 overall record, 5-1 conference mark and a victory over previously unbeaten (and top-ranked) Washington & Lee in an ODAC showdown that opened the door for Hampden-Sydney's sixth NCAA Tournament appearance. Six members of the Hampden-Sydney team also earned All-ODAC honors.

The conference's leading goal scorer, sophomore attack Chris Lucas, led a foursome of Tigers as First Team All-ODAC honorees. Also making the team were senior attack John Neely, senior keeper Scott Fava, and sophomore defenseman Chris Biddison. Sophomore midfielder Jason Rostan and junior defenseman Jason Archbell were recognized for their performance by being named Second Team All-ODAC.

Lucas led the team in scoring for the second straight season with 49 goals and 11 assists. Neely, a pre-season All-America nominee, finished second on the team with 33 goals and 14 assists. Fava finished with an 8.63 goals-against-average and .604 save percentage, along with registering 174 saves. Biddison, one of the top marking defenders in the ODAC, started 14 games for the Tigers and recorded three assists and 27 ground balls.

In the most thrilling victory of the season, Neely scored seven of the Tigers' 12 goals to lead 15th-ranked Hampden-Sydney to a 12-11 victory over top-ranked Washington & Lee at Fulton Field.

With just over 12 minutes left to play, the Tigers were ahead of the unbeaten General 11-6. However, Washington & Lee made a charge late in the fourth quarter to cut the Tiger lead to two. With Hampden-Sydney's momentum seemingly lost, sophomore attack Phil Dick scored an unassisted goal, but the Generals answered back quickly with two goals. But that was all Washington & Lee could muster, as Hampden-Sydney held on to win the conference championship. Senior keeper Scott Fava made 15 saves for the Tigers, including 13 in the second half.

This victory landed Hampden-Sydney in the NCAA Division III championships, where they hosted Denison University. Unfortunately, Denison jumped out to a 7-1 first-half lead and held on in the second half to win 10-5 and advance to the next round. According to Coach Rostan, "We just didn't play well in the first half...and you can't do that against a good team. We just didn't do the same kinds of things today, like winning faceoffs and getting all the groundballs, that we did in our win over Washington & Lee."

Tennis:
Hampden-Sydney's tennis team finished in fourth-place in the Old Dominion Athletic Conference Men's Tennis tournament. The team completed the season with a 7-5 overall record and a 6-1 conference mark.

Chris Duquette '02 finished runner-up in the ODAC tournament at number three singles and completed the season with a team-best 10-5 record and 6-1 mark in the conference. Rob Light '02 finished runner-up at number four singles and John Moss '02 finished fourth overall in the conference tournament at number one singles. Meanwhile, freshman two-sport athlete Cooper Wilson (he also plays basketball) completed his season with a fourth-place performance at the conference tournament. Tom Hogge '03 and Durell Carothers '03 finished fifth and sixth in the ODAC respectively at number five and two singles. At doubles, the team of Moss and Duquette finished second in the conference, while Carothers and Light captured third and Hogge and Wilson wound up fifth.

In 2002, the team returns 11 players, including all six starters, and adds one recruit, Jonathan Hubble, from Nansemond-Suffolk Academy.

John Neal '02 carries the ball for the Tigers. The team went on to become this year's conference champions after a thrilling victory over the W & L Generals.

Remembering a life of friendship, faith, and service

Leila Thompson, 1909-2001

By Richard McClintock, Director of Publications

AS THE FOURTH PERSON I MET at Hampden-Sydney College, Leila Thompson had a great influence on my decision to come here—a decision I have never regretted, the more so since it meant getting to know her better.

She and Dr. Graves Haydon Thompson '27 moved to Hampden-Sydney in September 1939. They lived in many houses around campus, from the upstairs apartment in the Alamo (where she built a new porch atop the old one, an innovation for which she insisted "folks on campus never forgave her") to Penshurst, where they spent 40 years, until they decided to move to a single-story house. (Beside Penshurst she and her daughters built a goldfish pool; her last concern on leaving Penshurst was to see that the fish were rescued.)

Leila Thompson seemed, at first glance, to be a quiet grandmotherly type, overflowing with good will, eager to give comfort, perfectly suited to the domestic expectations of her generation. One might never have guessed from her friendly bustling ways that she was "important," that she had a life of influence and respect beyond her home, across both state and nation—a life in which, with quite un-grandmotherly daring, she broke down many barriers and forged new paths for her gender.

Her life was characterized by busy attention to any work that needed doing—from managing Commencement luncheons (once furnished not by the College but by the ladies of the community) to running the Museum when it was without a curator. She helped also with the Alumni Association and the Record, which Dr. Thompson edited. In fall 1965, as she embarked upon an ever busier workload with the Presbyterian church, she retired after 13 years of "conspicuous service" to the Record; she was praised particularly for its new lively tone, which was "due in no small part to her quick eye, retentive brain, and devoted labors."

As an unofficial College hostess, she entertained in her home many distinguished visitors, including Viscount de Lisle, a descendant of the College's eponym Algernon Sydney. Eta Sigma Phi, the honorary classics fraternity, met there, and she always made her famous chocolate punch for the occasion. Both Eta Sigma Phi and Omicron Delta Kappa, the national leadership fraternity, elected her to honorary membership.

"The cultural and religious atmosphere of the campus finds its finest expression in the effective devotion of their lives."

In Farmville, Mrs. Thompson was for many years a member of the Judith Randolph chapter of the DAR, serving twice as chapter regent. She chaired the fundraising committee for the Prince Edward–Farmville Library and served on the literature division of the Farmville Woman's Club.

She was the first woman ever named chairman of the Council of the Synod of Virginia and the first woman elected Moderator of the Presbytery.

During her long career of volunteer service to the Presbyterian Church (U.S.), she held local, Presbyterial, and national leadership positions in both Women of the Church and Church Women United. For the Synod of Virginia, she sat on the boards of Sunnyside Presbyterian home and Massanetta Springs Conference Center. She was the first woman ever named chairman of the Council of the Synod of Virginia and, later, the first woman elected Moderator of the Presbytery. In 1974, she was elected a Ruling Elder at College Church, where she served as clerk of the Session for eight years.

At the national level, in the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, she served as secretary, vice chairman, and chairman of the Board of Women's Work, was a member of the Provisional General Board when the General Assembly was set up, and became a commissioner to the General Assembly in 1981. Her gift for teaching was in great demand throughout the Assembly, causing her to travel widely in that ministry.

She was listed in the 1977-78 edition of Marquis's Who's Who in Religion, and received many citations for her work from both church and lay organizations. She said she prized most the Algernon Sydney Sullivan Medallion given jointly to her and her husband by Hampden-Sydney College in 1973, recognizing decades of faithful and loving service to church, College, and community. In it President W. Taylor Reveley '39 honored them for what "they have done together to enrich the lives of students and members of the community. . . . Their home has been open and known for the gracious hospitality to be found there. The cultural and religious atmosphere of the campus finds its finest expression in the effective devotion of their lives."

She won my heart by making me feel secure in a strange place and by serving Sally Lunn for breakfast, a bread I had never tasted, because no one of my acquaint would take the time or energy to make it. She made it, she explained, whenever someone special came to visit.

She has had my heart for 26 years and has it still, and those of thousands more besides.

Class Notes

Compiled from information received by June 25, 2001.

1940

On March 7, 2001, Dr. ROBERT C. VAUGHAN, JR., was the guest speaker at the Lenten luncheon series for the Second Presbyterian Church in Petersburg. He was the pastor of Second Presbyterian for 27 years until 1984, and he is a past moderator of Hanover Presbytery and the Synod of the Virginias. He also is one of the founders of Downtown Churches United. The luncheon series began four decades ago as community outreach during Lent, and it gives the public an opportunity for worship, lunch, and fellowship.

1941

Dr. WILLIAM "BILLY" RUSSELL has retired from dental practice in Petersburg. He is an active elder in Tabb Street Presbyterian Church, and is also an avid fisherman.

1942

J. MARSHALL DOSWELL, JR., is chairing the newly established York County Disabilities Foundation and is leading a fund drive to build a new adult day-care center in York County, South Carolina.

On January 14, 2001, at the Wytheville Presbyterian Church, JOSEPH CROCKETT KELLEY was honored as elder emeritus. The occasion marked his retirement from the session, having served as an elder since 1964 and intermittently as clerk since 1977. He is the second person ever to receive the honor of elder emeritus of Wytheville Presbyterian Church.

The Virginia General Assembly voted unanimously to name a road from Roanoke to Blacksburg for GORDON WILLIS, SR. The decision honors his lifetime achievements and the work he did planning the road. An article in the Roanoke Times featured Willis and gave a short biography of his life alongside a history of the so-called "smart road," an electronically monitored highway based on experimental technological and safety research.

ROBERT GOLD has started a new career with GE Capital after working 29 years with IBM. He works in Paris, France, and is responsible for information technology across Europe. He plans to return to the U.S. this fall.

1958

MAX MEADOR will be retiring next year after teaching Latin and coaching baseball for over 40 years at Virginia Episcopal School. He was recently profiled in The Lynchburg News and Advance under the title "Veni, Vidi, Vici: Latin teacher conquers hearts of students past and present."

1960

JOSEPH H. "JIM" CUTLER, JR., who teaches world history and coaches varsity baseball at Liberty High School in Bedford, will be inducted into the Virginia Sports Hall of Fame on October 17. He is being honored for his four-decade long career, in which is teams racked up an overall 474-246 record; they had only six losing seasons. "This is a wonderful honor," Coach Cutler said. "It is more of a reflection on Liberty High School than on myself—I didn't win any of these games. The kids did. For me to get this honor, I've had to have had some really good kids." He has also coached football, boys and girls basketball, and Little League. He was also honored as Teacher of the Month for February 2001, receinving enthusiastic praise from his students.

WILLIAM P. CARTER received the Ally of the Year Award from the Virginia Economic Developers Association. He served the economic development community for over twenty years as a public finance investment banker. In 1985 he formed his own firm, Financial Corporation of Virginia, and later Carter, Kaplan & Company, which was acquired by Ferris, Baker Watts, Inc., in 1996. He then served as its Head of Virginia Public Finance. Some of his major accomplishments include the financing of the Virginia Horse Center in Lexington (Rockbridge County), the Reynolds wheel plant in Russell County, Southern Virginia College in Buena Vista, P.A. Plymouth, Inc., in Radford, and industrial parks and infrastructure in Farmville (Cumberland County) and in Front Royal (Warren County). He recently accepted the position of CFO and COO of Green Front Furniture in Farmville, but he remains involved as a consultant with Ferris, Baker Watts, Inc.

HARRY T. TALIAFERRO III was elected by Virginia's General Assembly to the Fifteenth Judicial Circuit Court; his eight-year term began in May. He had been a substitute judge on the court for the past eighteen years, as well as the town of Warsaw attorney for twenty-two years, and with the current firm of Smith, Murphy and Taliaferro, p.c., for twenty-seven years.

JOHN B. THORNTON, JR., is the manager of ESP Publications within iDBO at Intel in Hillsboro, Oregon. The organization addresses documentation support for a number of Intel software engineering efforts.

1974

Dr. JIM PHILLIPS, director of the Conflict Resolution Institute at VCU, has concluded a series of discussions involving the Sons and Daughters of the Confederacy, the NAACP, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, business executives, and several black and white ministers. As a result, the Chesterfield County Board of Supervisors adopted a consensus resolution to recognize April 2001 as Confederate History and Heritage month.

The Barton Malow Company, a construction management firm, has hired LANCE VAN DE CASTLE as a project manager. He has been in the Virginia construction industry for the past twenty-seven years.

RICHARD D. HOLCOMB, head of the Virginia Department of Motor Vehicles for the past seven years, has left the agency to become a lobbyist for the trucking industry. He is general counsel and senior vice president for the American Trucking Association.

Commander ROBERT LORIGAN has completed two years as the Commanding Officer of the Marine Safety Office in Juneau, Alaska. This summer he will be reassigned to be the Commanding Officer of the Marine Safety Office in Guam. He has served in the Coast Guard for over twenty-four years.

ROBERT M. STEWART has become a general partner in Spring Capital Investors, a 75 million-dollar venture capital fund based in Baltimore, Maryland.

As of April 1, 2001, ROBERT B. WILSON V is a judge in the Juvenile and Domestic Relations Court in Hampton. He serves on the same bench as Judge Nelson Durden '60.

1977

Dr. LARRY K. HILL was appointed to the Partnership Board of the University of South Carolina School of Medicine. He is currently practicing urology in Greenville, South Carolina.

1978

ALEX H. BELL has moved his insurance agency to a newly purchased building in Virginia Beach. He has been an agent with Nationwide Insurance since 1992. His son, a tenth grader at Norfolk Academy, plays goalie for their lacrosse team.

ROBERT B. JOHNSON was recently promoted to the position of district manager for Xerox Engineering Systems for the Mid-Atlantic Region.

In April KING H. DIETRICH was promoted to Captain, United States Navy. He is currently assigned to Cruiser Destroyer Group Two as an Operations Officer in Norfolk. This position follows his two years as the Commanding Officer of the U.S.S. Ticonderoga.

1980

CLARK W. LITTLE is national sales director for the corporate development group of the Dictaphone Corporation.

OVERTON McGEHEE is the executive director of the Greater Charlottesville Habitat for Humanity, which broke ground for its 25th home in April.

Dr. DAN UNGER IV is the chairman and residency program director of the department of orthopedics at the Naval Medical Center in Portsmouth. He also was promoted to the rank of Captain, United States Navy.

RUCKER SNEAD '81
Army planner and strategist

ALUMNI PROFILE

Rucker Snead '81, Parade Planner

"I'm a planner," Snead said, trying to sum up his 20-year military career. Not necessarily a parade planner, but that is what he found himself doing this past year: organizing the presidential inaugural parade as head of the Parade Division of the Armed Forces Inaugural Committee. He had never organized a parade before he began this job last August, but organizing troop movements and marching bands are not all that dissimilar.

Snead's main job was to ensure that all the many agencies and participants worked smoothly together. To help with this task, he had 300 people working for him. They rehearsed "what if" scenarios, such as bus breakdowns, blockading demonstrators, and missing high school bands. Despite that fact that it is "only" a parade, Snead was well aware of the importance of his assignment: "The world is watching the peaceful transfer of power…This parade is a symbol of how you should do business."

Given the extraordinary nature of the 2000 election, the inaugural parade had its own unique circumstances. Namely, Snead did not know for whom he was organizing the parade until much later than usual. "We knew there was going to be an inauguration on January 20," he said. "We knew the parade route would lead up Pennsylvania Avenue. So we started to plan." Because of the Florida controversy, they had only 31 days, instead of the usual 74, to work with the president-elect's Inaugural Committee. The marching bands, which are selected by the Inaugural Committee from 200 audition tapes, were not notified until December 22. While this made for a busy Christmas, the shortened schedule had one big advantage, according to Snead: "It forced decisions to be made quickly."

The military has been involved in the inauguration ever since George Washington. Snead and the army, however, are not directly involved in the security detail, which is left to the civilian authorities. It was a potential nightmare of jurisdictions, he recalled, with areas where the sidewalks belong to one agency and the street belongs to another. The Secret Service has ultimate oversight over all security issues, and works to coordinate nineteen different law enforcement agencies. Because of the contentious election, security, and dealing with the expected protesters, was a major concern. Yet this has to be done unobtrusively: "You don't want to create an armed state or the appearance that the president is not safe."

The miserable weather reduced the size of the crowd and dampened many of the protests. All in all, Snead recalled it as one "long, wet day." But everything went according to plan. "I had great people working for me," he said. "I knew this would be an interesting job. The inauguration is a special event."

Since this past March, Snead has worked at the Pentagon as a member of the Joint Staff. He is assigned to the Doctrine Branch, developing standard procedures for the joint employment of the different branches of the military. "It's an effort to capture how we do business," he said, "and bring the various branches to a consensus." When providing close air support, for example, the Army, Air Force, and the Marine Corps need to know "how to talk and work with each other."

Before this assignment, Snead was in Saudi Arabia for a year, teaching the Saudi Army how to operate the M1A2 tanks they had purchased from the United States. "It was a fascinating opportunity to live in another society and culture," he said of being one of only 11 American soldiers in a town near the Jordanian border.

Snead's previous foreign assignments have taken him to Haiti, Kuwait, Egypt, and Germany. In Haiti, he worked with the United Nations Mission and the Organization of American States trying to help restore democracy. "It took me back to reading the Federalist Papers and being in Dr. Marion's constitutional law course," he said. His domestic postings have taken him to Fort Stewart, Georgia, Leavenworth, Kansas, and the National Military Command Center (NMCC) in D.C.. At the NMCC he was part of a Watch Team that monitored and responded to the world's security situation.

A French and political science major, Snead originally intended to go to law school. He did a senior independent study on the Persian Gulf, knowledge which came in handy years later through numerous trips to the Middle East. After graduation, he enlisted and went to Officer Candidate School. He did return to school a few years ago, earning a master's degree in History while teaching ROTC at Appalachian State University.

The army has changed dramatically since Snead entered during the Cold War. "It was much easier to train and prepare when you knew who the enemy was." Given the political instability of many world regions, Snead knows his next assignment could be almost anywhere. Anywhere, that is, except Pennsylvania Avenue again.

SASHA RABCHEVSKY '88
Neuroscientist

ALUMNI PROFILE

Sasha Rabchevsky '88, neuroscientist

In a lab at the University of Kentucky, Dr. Alexander "Sasha" Rabchevsky routinely uses a custom-designed "impactor device" to inflict spinal cord injuries on rats. A carefully calibrated weight slams down on the exposed spinal cord and causes paralysis. The rats, however, will recover from this injury in a few weeks. Humans subjected to equivalent impacts will never walk again.

Or will they? That's the "ultimate goal of my research," Rabchevsky said, though he has no illusions about the huge scientific obstacles in front of him and other neuroscientists. "Rats have a way of bouncing back that we can learn from," he said; "They have endogenous repair mechanisms that we're trying to understand." Scientists are pursuing a number of different avenues to understand this, and no one knows right now what may eventually work. "Some people have told Christopher Reeve [the actor] that he'll walk again. Personally I'm a skeptic," Rabchevsky admitted. "I don't give up hope, but I'm not holding my breath."

Instead of holding his breath, Rabchevsky is diligently plugging away at the basic research that will help us to better understand, and perhaps treat, spinal cord injury. Unlike most of his scientific peers, however, he has more at stake than simply professional interest. In August of 1985, right before he was to begin his junior year at Hampden-Sydney (and vie for a strong safety position on the football team), Rabchevsky was involved in a motorcycle accident that left him a paraplegic. "It happened and all of a sudden your whole life is changed," he recalled, "It was both a humbling experience and a kick in the ass." When he was in the hospital and realized he might never walk again, he read about spinal cord injury research and found a rigid dogma about the bleak prospects for recovery or regeneration.

To Rabchevsky, this seemed like a challenge: "I thought, 'why isn't there a cure? If this damage is indeed irreversible, I want to be one of the people deciding that'."

When he returned to Hampden-Sydney, Rabchevsky put enormous pressure on himself to succeed: "I wanted to prove that I didn't need anybody's pity." He credits numerous people, including Lewis and Nell Drew, Bill Shear, and Bob Rogers with helping him at crucial junctures and making sure that he graduated only a semester behind the rest of his class.

Rabchevsky, however, is reluctant to see his life story in sentimental, movie-of-the-week terms. To him, the accident is a fact that happened 16 years ago and which has been part of his life ever since. "At some point," he said, "I adopted the DWI principle: 'deal with it'." He may have physical limitations, but he does not let them limit what he does or where he goes: "Wherever your wheels can go, your hands must go. It just depends on how intrepid you are."

The way he dealt with it was to earn a Ph.D. in neuroscience from the University of Florida. He then completed a two-year post-doctoral fellowship at the University of Paris (XII). Living for two years in France had its own challenges, including a lesser awareness of disability issues: "I never saw anyone else in a wheelchair," he recalled. After France, Rabchevsky and his wife Gisele moved to Lexington, where he is now a Research Associate in the Sanders-Brown Center on Aging at the University of Kentucky. He is currently negotiating for an assistant professorship in the Spinal Cord and Brain Injury Research Center there, as well for positions in several other institutes with strong spinal cord injury research programs.

There are several key avenues of spinal cord injury research and Rabchevsky is involved in three of them. He is studying how basic fibroblast growth factor (bFGF) therapy enhances functional recovery after acute spinal cord injury in the rat. A drug called methylprednisolone is currently the standard acute treatment for all human spinal cord injuries (Rabchevsky himself did not receive it at the time of his injury). He is now publishing a paper demonstrating that it "shows absolutely no benefits by itself at the dosages being used." Not one to shy away from controversy, he admits, "I may raise a few eyebrows with this report."

In what he calls "an entirely different approach," Rabchevsky recently received a grant from the International Spinal Research Trust, based in London, to study autonomic dysreflexia, a condition frequently suffered by people with spinal cord injury, including him. Characterized as "a panic phase," the body reacts dramatically, often with episodic hypertension, to something going wrong below the level of injury, something possibly as simple as an ingrown toenail or sitting on a tack. In essence, Rabchevsky said, it consists of "reflex loops that go haywire." The death of NFL star Derrick Thomas two years ago is thought to have stemmed from a dysreflexic heart attack suffered while being transferred from a bed to a chair, following standard treatment for his paralysis caused by an auto accident. His perfectly healthy heart failed from the sudden overload of his sensory system. "I'm going to be using adenovirus gene therapy to prevent the abnormal nerve sprouting in the injured spinal cord that leads to this condition," Rabchevsky said. "This will help us understand the mechanisms of natural spontaneous regeneration, and will add a piece of the puzzle of promoting regeneration."

Transplantation of microglial cells into the injured spinal cord is the third focus of Rabchevsky's research. Based on his findings, he believes they actively contribute to regeneration, whereas the conventional wisdom says they act primarily to inhibit growth. By studying the glial cells around the injury site, he hopes to develop an effective means of encouraging spinal nerve cell regeneration. At this point, he said, "regeneration is possible but we do not know how to direct it to the desired targets."

In addition to all his time in the lab, Rabchevsky also has had to learn how to play the game of scientific funding. "The art of grantsmanship is crucial," he said. "And I credit the Hampden-Sydney rhetoric program for much of my success. Unfortunately, it's often the sexy science, not necessarily the good science, that gets funded." His studies on bFGF therapy are directly supported by the Kentucky Spinal Cord and Head Injury Research Trust (KSCHIRT), a state fund that collects 10% of all speeding and drunk driving tickets, acknowledging that most spinal cord injuries are the result of motor vehicle accidents.

Ultimately, Rabchevsky believes that any successful treatment will be combinational therapy, most likely using growth factors and transplantation of certain stem cells or glial cells. "There will be no magic bullet," he said. Going from paralysis to a full range of motion may be overly optimistic. "If the ultimate goal is functional recovery," he asked, "how do you measure that? How about getting two or three levels of functional recovery back? Walking is a tall order. It will be like a baby learning to walk all over again, but with a fundamentally different complement of neural circuitry." Despite his apparent scientific skepticism, Rabchevsky will keep working on a treatment, step by step. "This is an exciting time," he said, "and while I may not benefit from my own research, I hope it will eventually help others afflicted by spinal cord injury."

The Sands Brothers: Rob Bonaventura '83, George Gleusner '83 & James Allardice '97, stockbrokers

Rob Bonaventura and George Gleusner were roommates and teammates in college; they now sit side by side at a New York investment firm.

A stock trading floor high above Park Avenue may be about as far from the serenity of the Hampden-Sydney campus as you can get. While it is not literally on Wall Street, which lies several miles south, it is Wall Street, the type of place where markets are made and fortunes won or lost in an afternoon. Hundreds of screens flash rising and falling stock prices, while dozens of brokers pace the aisles breathlessly talking into headset phones to their clients. Uneaten lunches sit next to stacks of analysts' reports.

Amidst all of this, a group of Hampden-Sydney alumni thrive. Two of them, Rob Bonaventura and George Gleusner, were roommates and teammates in college; they now sit side by side at this New York investment firm called Sands Brothers. It was founded in 1990 by Bonaventura and the two Sands brothers, childhood friends from Long Island. As teenage entrepreneurs they sold Italian ices together at the beach, pegging their price to the day's temperature. After working with his own brother in the wholesale clothing business, Bonaventura was lured into the stock market by the Sands brothers, who were starting their own brokerage firm. He admits, "I didn't have a lot of interest in stocks and bonds," but he learned quickly. It helped that he picked the right time to enter the business: "The market timing was pretty good. We caught the wave," he said. Now senior managing director (i.e., the number-three guy in the firm), Bonaventura has seen Sands Brothers grow to almost 400 employees, with additional offices in San Francisco, Toronto, and, most recently, London. "Our reputation five years ago," he said, "if you knew who we were, was as an aggressive, retail cold-calling firm. Now, our reputation is as a NYSE-level boutique with a focus on technology and a very good reputation in venture capital and private equity."

When the firm started to expand, they first looked for friends and family. Thus, George Gleusner left the Bank of New York in 1991 to join his former lacrosse teammate and Lambda Chi brother. Now senior vice president, Gleusner said, "We started at the same time as all these bucket shops, boiler rooms, and penny stock firms. They're all out of business and the guys are going to jail." What sets Sands Brothers apart, he said, is their attention to clients and their rigorous training program. "A lot of brokers went into hiding when the market went down last year. We stress that you have to keep in contact with your clients. When the phone weighs 400 pounds and it's the worst time to call, that's when you gotta call. That builds relationships with clients."

A significant portion of Sands Brothers' business involves asset management for fairly wealthy individuals. "Most are experienced and understand the volatility of the market," Bonaventura said. They are also more willing to ride out a rough patch. Gleusner added that he and the other brokers are right there in the trenches with their clients: "If I'm going to put your money into a stock, I'm going to put my own money in it too."

An increasing element of their business lies in the private equity and investment banking markets. Because of their presence in technology stocks, Sands Brothers is able to structure a number of investments for their clients, ones that previously were only available to the biggest of big investors. Whereas the $5 million client is often frozen out of the big IPO deals, Bonaventura said, Sands Brothers offers venture funds with a lower threshold (say $250,000 instead of $10 million).

Despite the rocky markets of the past 18 months, they are still committed to investing in technology companies. According to Gleusner, "We haven't shifted from high-tech. The bubble burst but the Internet is not going away." Bonaventura echoed this: "It's still the area you want to be in," though he added that they are more diversified now. Part of this commitment stems from the nature of their clients, many of whom are technology executives heavily invested in their own industry. This focus on the cutting-edge of business, or what they call "disruptive technologies," can also be educational. "I can go to a cocktail party," Gleusner said, "and talk to a doctor about biotechnology or an optical engineer about fiber optics. It makes you very well rounded dealing with all these companies."

As senior members of the firm, both Bonaventura and Gleusner spend much of their time working with younger brokers. They are proud of how Sands Brothers groups the trainees into teams and matches them up with mentors to learn the business firsthand. "Our training program is probably more valuable than any business school," claimed Bonaventura.

James Allardice '97 can attest to this. He started at Sands Brothers right out of college: "The training program was pretty intense, and a lot like Hampden-Sydney, with the chance to get one-on-one help with senior people. I was Rob's right hand when I started." From his beginnings as a trainee, which involves cold calling clients to open new accounts, Allardice has risen rapidly, becoming the quickest person to reach vice president in the firm's history. Now he is one of the mentors entrusted with training the new guys.

More than just the nuts and bolts of the market, new brokers need to learn customer service. This is where sitting next to an experienced broker can be invaluable. "They're not buying the stock, they're buying you," Gleusner said of his clients, many of whom are known only over the phone. One guy trusted $5 million to him without ever meeting face to face. With the rise of 24-hour news channels, Wall Street now receives headline attention, making it even more important for the broker to help his client sift through the information glut, especially when news accounts exaggerate market swings and create snowballing trends.

When the firm reached a critical size and could no longer hire just friends and family, Bonaventura steered their recruiting efforts toward Hampden-Sydney. In addition to Allardice, he hired Ian McDade '95, Mark Finelli '98, and a handful of other alumni as both trainees and as interns. "I'm looking for people who are ambitious and can be aggressive," he said, noting that athletes are often a good fit (even ones who did not play lacrosse).

This may be because a broker needs to be willing to treat each day like a new game. On good days the market can be exhilarating, while on bad days, there is not much pleasure in telling a client that his portfolio took a serious hit. At those times, said Gleusner, "It's you, the world, and the phone."

ALUMNI PROFILE

Keith Scott Whyte '92, social watchdog

Mention the word "gambling" and most people think of Vegas casinos, scratch-off lottery tickets, or NCAA office pools. In the past twenty years, America has become a nation of gamblers, with 47 states sponsoring lotteries and over 1,000 casinos nationwide. Whatever religious or social stigma gambling once had has largely fallen by the wayside. To Keith Whyte, however, gambling also means the unfortunate side effects of our nation's love of the wager: the bankrupt families and damaged lives caused by pathological gambling.

As executive director of the National Council on Problem Gambling, Whyte takes a neutral position on gambling. He's not crusading against it and freely admits to putting down his twenty bucks whenever he's in Vegas. "Most people who gamble suffer no consequences other than perhaps losing their money," he said. Pathological gamblers, on the other hand, are the ones who can't stop gambling, no matter what it's doing to their lives. The form of gambling used doesn't make much difference. "The grandmother hooked on bingo has just as much of a problem as the blackjack addict," Whyte said. "It's less about the money lost than about their compulsion and their inability to stop gambling."

There are 2.5 million pathological gamblers in the U.S. While this group used to be 80% male, the gender balance is now about 50/50, as women can now be found engaged in all forms of gambling. Another 2-3% of the U.S. population is categorized as problem gamblers. The National Council on Problem Gambling (NCPG) works to increase public awareness, to ensure that treatment is available for problem gamblers and their families, and to encourage research and prevention programs.

"For most problem gamblers," Whyte said, "there's no place to go." Through 33 state affiliates and a nationwide 24-hour helpline (which received 115,000 calls last year), the NCPG provides a place to turn.

So how does a Hampden-Sydney history major become a national expert on problem gambling? After working for the department of Health and Human Services and the American Bar Association, Whyte developed a keen interest in public policy. He was then named Director of Research for the American Gaming Association, an industry group representing casino owners. "I became interested in the issues surrounding problem gambling," he said, "like personal responsibility, addiction, and risk-taking behavior." He was also influenced by President emeritus Samuel Vaughan Wilson's emphasis on public service. In 1998, Whyte was offered the directorship of the NCPG, an agency that had been in existence since 1972. Since taking charge, he has moved the headquarters to Washington, D.C. and doubled their budget.

Having a liberal arts background has helped Whyte manage the wide variety of roles involved in running a national association with minimal staffing. As executive director, he is responsible for fundraising, public relations, lobbying, and administration. He has traveled the world, testified before Congress (photo below), and appeared on CNN. From his modest office on Capitol Hill, Whyte attends to both the big picture and the small details of his agency. He works on lobbying efforts to get pathological gambling accorded the same status as alcoholism, which will lead to better insurance coverage. He tries to get gambling companies to acknowledge problem gambling and to support treatment programs. He is also trying to eliminate the use of unattended lottery vending machines, as in Virginia, because they encourage underage gambling.

While the NCPG has no intention of trying to eliminate gambling, it is concerned with "the lure of easy participation,"or all the cheap available gambling that may entice young people into dangerous habits.

"Gambling isn't going away," Whyte said, "it's a 60-billion-dollar-a-year business." A whole generation is growing up accustomed to widespread gambling. One study shows that 40% of 12-17 year olds have gambled on sports. "There's a bookie on every college campus," he said.

For Whyte, gambling easily becomes a window into human nature, and questions such as "Why do people take risks?" and "What makes some people become thrillseekers?" He lectures at academic conferences and keeps abreast of recent psychological studies. "We're on the cutting edge of trying to answer some of these questions," he said. "The brain of a cocaine addict and the brain of a problem gambler show the same areas lighting up."

Aside from the intellectual rewards, Whyte enjoys the satisfaction of running a non-profit organization committed to the public good: "I know I can make a difference in the lives of problem gamblers and their families."

His liberal-arts background has helped Whyte manage the wide variety of roles involved in running a national association with minimal staffing. As executive director, he is responsible for fundraising, public relations, lobbying, and administration. He has traveled the world, testified before Congress, and appeared on CNN.

Alumni Activities

Walter M. Bortz II, the keynote speaker at Alumni College and cousin of President Walter M. Bortz III.

"The Best Is Yet to Be": the 2001 Alumni Summer College

This year's Alumni Summer College, held June 1-3, focused on the theme of "Aging in America." The keynote address, "Redefining Human Aging," was presented by Dr. Walter M. Bortz II, a nationally-recognized authority on aging and the cousin of Hampden-Sydney's president. A physician, Dr. Bortz is past president of the American Geriatric Society and a former co-chair of the AMA-ANA Task Force on Aging.

Saturday's sessions were kicked off by Ron Moore '76, the president and CEO of FamilyCareAmerica, an internet-based resource for care-givers. Moore founded the company after his first-hand experience with a parent's eldercare needs. This was followed by a panel discussion on "Politics and Population: Social Security, Medicare, and the Politics of Reform," featuring Dr. Ken Townsend, (economics), Dr. Saranna Thornton, (economics), and Dr. David Marion, (political science). Dr. Sarah Hardy, (English), then presented "Aging in Literature," with discussion groups led by Dr. Elizabeth Deis (rhetoric and humanities) and Dr. Lowell Frye (rhetoric and humanities).

On Sunday morning, the Alumni College concluded with two panel discussions: The first, "Aging Across Cultures," featured Dr. James Arieti, (classics), Dr. Dieudonne Afatsawo, (modern languages), and Dr. Kenneth Lehman, (history). The final panel addressed "The Science and Ethics of Aging: Can We Increase Lifespan, and Should We?" It was conducted by Dr. Alex Werth, (biology), Dr. Steve Bloom (physics and astronomy), Dr. Michael Dougherty (biology), and Dr. James Janowski (philosophy).

ON THE COVER
Scenes from a successful year.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

This past year, my first at the helm of this wonderful old College, was very special in so many ways. It was a year of learning, growth, achievement, and success as the institution moved forward on many fronts. Hampden-Sydney College continues to be one of the Nation's most treasured environments for the education of good men and good citizens.

By now most of you know the numbers that support this institution's growth and development. We set another record for the unrestricted Annual Fund with $2.2 million, up more than 10% from last year's $2 million. We also brought in record dollars for endowment—over $4 million—and set a new record for total giving to Hampden-Sydney College at $7.7 million. For these accomplishments, all of us who have the privilege to labor daily on the Hill are immensely grateful. Your support, offered in so many ways, has been vital as we strive to maintain the central character of this place while responding to our country's 21st century challenges.

Walter M. Bortz III
President, Hampden-Sydney College

Your support has manifested in yet another significant way as the College began this year with over 1,000 students for the first time ever. The 1,026 students who enrolled this fall brought to fruition a goal first proposed by Taylor Reveley some thirty-five years ago during his presidency. I must say that the sense of excitement accompanying the record enrollment is absolutely palpable. There has been a wonderful spirit about the campus from day one. Even the tragic events of September 11 have added to this campus's sense that there is special meaning to what we do here and an importance to the time spent in this atmosphere of sound learning. Following the attack on our country, students organized prayer vigils and participated in a host of activities in support of victims and affected families. The number of people who signed up to work on the Habitat House we are constructing is evidence that the spirit of contributing to the larger good of the community pervades all that we do here. All of us have pulled together in introspection and in validation of those values that have been so much a part of Hampden-Sydney College since its beginnings on November 10, 1775. Surely there is no better foundation upon which to build a new world in the new century than on the characteristics of honor and integrity that are at the core of what we teach and believe.

I look forward to working with each of you during the 2001-2002 year and beyond as we construct the Hampden-Sydney College of the next hundred years. Thank you again for your beneficence. And thank you on behalf of those who will continue to benefit from this wonderful academic community that you help to make possible.

A COLLEGE ON A ROLL

"Too good to be true."

This comment buzzed all over campus last year while the College was being introduced to its new president, Dr. Walter M. Bortz III. A year later, with the numbers from the fiscal and academic year rolling in, this refrain echoes at Hampden-Sydney College once again.

The 2000-01 year has been one of broken records. More than just another successful fund-raising year, Hampden-Sydney enjoyed the largest annual fund giving in its history. The College is also celebrating the success of this year's admissions efforts—opening enrollment this fall is 1026, exceeding 1000 for the first time. The freshman class of 329 includes 54 honors scholars, yet another milestone. These numbers are the result of strong recruitment combined with a concerted effort to stop attrition.

Then again, based on admissions selectivity, an increase in the percentage of alumni giving, and an improved retention rate, the 2001 U.S. News ranking of "Best Liberal Arts Colleges – Bachelor's" places Hampden-Sydney College in the top half nationally. Among the 200 liberal arts colleges that received a national ranking, Hampden-Sydney College was placed in the second highest of five tiers.

In August, Hampden-Sydney College was selected by The Washington Times Insight magazine as one of the top 15 colleges and universities that "still teach the fullness of the Western academic tradition."

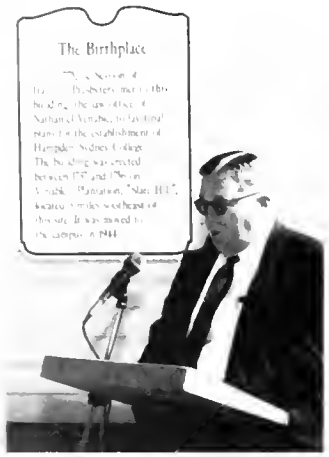
FINANCES

Fundraising: For the 2000-2001 fiscal year (ending June 30), the annual fund reached $7,705,991, an all-time record. Within the overall annual fund, the portion designated for annual budget support also set a record at $2,201,094. This includes the establishment of eleven new scholarships, four new endowed awards, one unitrust, and twelve gift annuities; in time, the annuities will become two endowed scholarships, one professorship, one unrestricted endowment, one unrestricted fund, one football fund, and Museum and Music Festival funds.

"Ninety-seven percent of our planned gifts this year came in the form of trusts and gift annuities," said Barbara Henley, Director of Planned Giving. "Both vehicles let the donor make a gift, receive a tax deduction, and receive income from the College for their lifetime. As you can see, these kinds of gifts have multiple benefits."

Director of Alumni Relations Howard W. Stracke '75 hard at work on the Habitat for Humanity House built on campus this fall. His contruction expertise was put to good use as students, families, faculty, and staff worked around the clock to provide a needy family with a home.

During the inauguration of Dr. Walter M. Bortz III as 23rd President of Hampden-Sydney College, a silent auction was held that raised over $2,300 for reading programs in Prince Edward County. The funds were used to provide 200 illustrated dictionaries to Prince Edward County elementary school students.



Professor John L. Brinkley '59 gives remarks at the rededication of the 18th century "Slate Hill" law office where Hampden-Sydney College was founded. The Birthplace was carefully restored in conjunction with the College's 225th anniversary.

Endowment: In spite of a very difficult year financially, Hampden-Sydney College ended its fiscal year on June 30, 2001, solidly in the black for the 23rd consecutive year. At June 30, 2001, the College's financial report showed total assets of $177.4 million, a reduction of approximately $17 million from June 30, 2000. The College's total endowment value as of June 30, 2001, was $101.7 million, reflecting a decrease of $18 million from June 30, 2000. The reductions are entirely attributable to the performance of the market; Hampden-Sydney was no more immune to the poor market conditions of fiscal year (FY) 2001 than was anyone else.

Once again the auditors awarded the College a "clean" audit with no exceptions noted. This is particularly notable because the audit not only covers the College's financial operations but also encompasses all federal programs, including the highly complex financial aid operations.

Hampden-Sydney College participates in the Annual Endowment Study undertaken each year by the National Association of College and University Business Officers (NACUBO). This survey, which covers the vast majority of managed endowment funds in the United States, is the definitive report on endowment performance and management in the United States. As of June 30, 2001, Hampden-Sydney College's endowment size ranked 270th among the 568 reporting institutions.

Budget: The College's revenue for FY 2000-2001 was $35,238,705; 41% of the revenue came from tuition and fees. This percentage has been roughly consistent for the past eight years.

The College's expenditures totaled $34,918,334, with over forty-one percent (41.6 %) of the money going to the areas of instruction, scholarships, and fellowships. [See Revenues and Expenditures chart below].

The Rostan Field Lacrosse Practice Facility, named after head coach Ray Rostan (second from right), was dedicated in a ceremony last fall. Rostan, a two-time U.S.I.L.A. Coach of the Year and the 2001 Old Dominion Athletic Conference Coach of the Year, was also named an assistant to the U.S. Lacrosse team last year.

ACADEMICS

Students: At the core of any fund-raising effort is support for students. While most donors cannot know their beneficiaries personally, it is nevertheless important that they have a sense of who they are.

In the fall of 2001, the College enrolled a record 1,026 students. Fifty-nine percent of the freshman class graduated from public high schools, forty-one percent from private. The state most represented is Virginia (67% of the class), followed by North Carolina, Maryland, South Carolina, and Alabama. There are 23 states represented and one foreign country.

Although enrollment exceeded 1,000 for the first time in College history, emphasis on small classes has not wavered. Seventy percent of the classes this fall had fewer than 20 students; the student-faculty ratio is 11 to 1. The most popular majors are economics (31% of declared majors) and history (20%), followed by political science (10%), biology (9%), English (7%), and psychology (7%).

What is perhaps most impressive about the success of last year's recruiting efforts is that, despite the increase in enrollment, the Admissions Committee exercised greater selectivity than in years past. This fall, in keeping with a general increase over the last eleven years, the number of Honors Scholars jumped from 43 to 54.

Attracting and retaining high-caliber students requires significant resources. The College's financial aid program tailors its awards to students from a range of backgrounds. Overall, more than $14 million in financial aid was distributed to students this year, reaching 88% of students.

Need-based aid goes to 47% of all students. Of the $14 million in financial aid, 46% came from Hampden-Sydney sources, 37% from federal programs, 14% from state sources, and 3% from elsewhere.

Faculty: A dedicated and experienced faculty is the very sinew of a distinguished academic program. And Hampden-Sydney College is in no short supply. Seventy-six percent of current faculty have earned doctoral degrees or the highest degrees in their field.

Hampden-Sydney College professors are known for their dedication to teaching and for their unusual accessibility to students both in and out of the classroom. But, while they are required to be teachers first, they are ably supported in their research pursuits. A sampling of recent projects includes:

• Elliott Professor of Fine Arts David Dodge Lewis just finished a sabbatical year in his studio. His work is now on display in three concurrent shows: Not So Still Life, an exhibit of drawings at Hodges Taylor Gallery in Charlotte; a series of drawings, Paleolithic Tools, at the Longwood Center for the Visual Arts; and The Seven Year Itch, his sabbatical exhibit at Hampden-Sydney's Atkinson Museum.

• Elliott Assistant Professor of Modern Languages Joan McRae was recently invited to Harvard University to deliver a lecture about "Belle dame sans mercy" and her work in the theory and practice of editing and translating medieval literature.

• Associate Professor of Psychology Dan Mossler spent his sabbatical directing research

Dr. Anthony Kerlavage, Senior Director of Product Strategy for Celera Genomics, the private company that published their genome sequences last year, was one of many important figures to speak during last year's symposium entitled "Know Thyself: The Human Genome Project."

Dr. James Kidd and Ethan Sloane celebrate the 20th anniversary of the Hampden-Sydney Music Festival. The Festival, which Kidd and Sloane founded in 1981, is now nationally recognized for its chamber music and performances.

on abused children in the Child-Parent Attachment Clinic at the University of Virginia. While there, he co-authored a manuscript that has been approved for publication in Child Abuse and Neglect, the premier international journal in the field.

In addition, faculty members have been busy bringing a number of cultural and intellectual programs to campus. Last winter, Hampden-Sydney played host as some of the biggest names in ethics, law, and science addressed the ethical, legal, and social implications of our dawning genetic future for the symposium entitled "Know Thyself: The Human Genome Project." With uncanny timing, the long-planned symposium fell during the week in February in which both the publicly funded consortium and the private company Celera Genomics published their genome sequences.

INFRASTRUCTURE

The Campus: After months of discussion about the planning and design of a new library, fine arts center, and student services center, alumni and members of the community are now able to view a design model of the proposed changes. Richmond-based architects Marcellus, Wright, Cox & Smith were hired to prepare the model. After a brief appearance at Founders Weekend at the Greenbrier and at a community meeting on campus, the model now sits on display in Settle Hall.

The proposed fine arts center will have four stories, a three-hundred-seat theater and concert hall, and an additional one-hundred-seat studio theater. What is now Eggleston Library will be transformed into a student services center, consolidating many of the activities and services central to student life. The new library, scaled at around 90,000 square feet, is to be positioned behind the Winston Hall parking lot, on the site of the Blake offices and apartments. It will feature three above-ground levels and will be geared to handle the College's growing technological demands.

These new buildings will be well equipped to serve future campus needs. But those close to the project emphasize the aesthetic quality of the structures as well. The Master Plan, the guide for this proposed development, encourages the College to preserve architectural consistency and enhance the subtle yet elegant landscape of the campus.

The Birthplace, the 1750s law office in which Hampden-Sydney College was founded, underwent careful and extensive restoration this past year. The project included lifting the building, constructing a new foundation, and replacing the 19th-century chimney with an 18th-century-style chimney of reproduction brick. Damaged siding was replaced with new boards milled to reproduce the remaining 18th-century clapboards, and the roof was replaced with period cedar shingles. The interior has been similarly restored and furnished with antique furniture, the gifts of Mrs. T. E. Crawley '41 and of Mr. and Mrs. John B. Long '38. Last February, a ceremony was held to rededicate the Birthplace. The restoration was made possible by grants from the Roller-Bottimore Foundation and the Marietta McNeill Morgan and Samuel Tate Morgan, Jr., Foundation, both of Richmond. The Roller-Bottimore Foundation's $100,000 grant was awarded in memory of Royal E. Cabell, Jr. '43, who served on the College's Board for nearly 30 years.

Technology: Enhancing teaching through technology has been a pervasive goal of the College in the past year. The implementation of Blackboard, a product that allows teachers to create web-ready course material, represents a great stride in this area. Without having to create their own web pages, faculty members can use Blackboard to create course-specific sites that include syllabi, lecture notes, and announcements. Students can access this information twenty-four hours a day. Blackboard administers on-line quizzes, digital drop-boxes for papers and other assignments, a calendar, and a grade book.

In the context of Hampden-Sydney's unique academic environment, Blackboard's ability to accommodate electronic communication is perhaps its most valuable feature. The on-line discussion allows professors to imrove their understanding of the strengths and weaknesses of their students and to structure classroom time accordingly. Also, the electronic communication often allows an in-class discussion to evolve much further than an hour's class time could afford. Because this on-line discussion allows for more efficient use of classroom time, Blackboard supplements, rather than replaces, the intimate classroom experience enjoyed by students at Hampden-Sydney.

The upgraded Hampden-Sydney web site is perhaps the most visible technological advancement in the last year. The newly designed site offers up-to-date information in a standard format for ease of navigation and fast download speed. Flash animation in the new Picture Gallery is allowing admissions to broaden their appeal to prospective students. Also, the College's web site now offers a convenient way to support your alma mater on-line. This secure site is a safe way to make your gift via VISA or MasterCard. You can visit at www.hsc.edu.

STUDENT ACHIEVEMENTS

Anyone familiar with the academic landscape of Hampden-Sydney College knows the valuable role of co-curricular involvement in the educational process here—and the equally valuable role of generous alumni and friends in making these activities possible. Beyond the classroom, our students engage in athletics, the arts, community service, and a host of additional pursuits:

• For years, Hampden-Sydney's basketball team has represented a model combination of athletic and academic excellence. Last year's young team, returning only three seniors, won the Old Dominion Athletic Conference championship and then stormed into the NCAA Division III tournament. Coach Tony Shaver's Tigers finished their season with a 24-5 record. In keeping with an amazing tradition, nine members of the Hampden-Sydney basketball team were on the Dean's list, earning GPAs of 3.3 or better in fall 2000; Brandon Randall and Matt Rannals earned 4.0 GPAs. Overall, the team's 3.11 cumulative GPA makes it one of the best academic basketball teams in school history.

• Hampden-Sydney theater presented A Midsummer Night's Dream and Betrayal on its home stage and then found its way to the 2001 Festival Fringe in Edinburgh, Scotland, this past summer. Following in the footsteps of Sonnet Variations, presented previously at Fringe, this year's group presented a thrilling collection of David Ives' one-acts. Soon after their return, the fine arts department announced an ambitious fall production, the musical 1776.

• Hampden-Sydney College's Entrepreneurship Society brings successful businessmen to campus in the Visiting Executive Program. Among last year's speakers was Ron Moore '76, a creator of the "Office America" concept and founder of the online service for caregivers, Family Care America. He spoke to students in the Society about how to identify and seize opportunities in the business world.

Mrs. Irma C. Sprinkle of Marion, Virginia. Her generous gift to the College in memory of her husband, Dr. Willis M. Sprinkle '20, helps students from Southwest Virginia who are interested in pursuing a career in medicine. It is hoped that the Willis McCollum Sprinkle scholarship will encourage more young men from that area to get their medical degrees and return to the region to practice medicine.

Delegate Harvey Morgan '52 offers a proclamation to the 2000-2001 basketball team in recognition of their athletic and academic excellence. Accepting the award on behalf of the team is Assistant Coach Ryan "Bubba" Smith.

HAMPDEN-SYDNEY FACTS

HAMPDEN-SYDNEY COLLEGE is a four-year traditional liberal arts college for men. Its 660-acre campus is in south-central Virginia, 60 miles southwest of Richmond. Since 1776 Hampden-Sydney has sustained its mission "to form good men and good citizens in an atmosphere of sound learning." Ranked among the country's top liberal arts institutions, the College continues to live up to its historical promise by producing honorable men who serve the public good. Among its alumni are one U.S. President, thirteen Senators, and many Congressmen, state representatives, doctors, attorneys, ministers, and leaders in business and industry (one alumnus in ten is president, owner, or CEO of a company).

NON-DISCRIMINATION POLICY

Hampden-Sydney College, while exempted from Subpart C of the Title IX regulation with respect to its admissions and recruitment activities, does not discriminate on the basis of race, color, sex, religion, age, national origin, handicap, or veteran status in the operation of its education programs and with respect to employment. For information on this non-discrimination policy, contact the Business Office, Box 127, Hampden-Sydney College, Hampden-Sydney, VA 23943, (804) 223-6220.

CHAIRMAN'S MESSAGE

The following pages list the members of The Society of Founders of Hampden-Sydney College who made gifts to the College during the fiscal year ending June 30, 2001. Once again, it was the Founders who led the way in overall giving, both to the annual fund and for capital projects.

William C. Boinest '54
Chairman of the Board of Trustees, Hampden-Sydney College

Of the $7,705,991 record amount raised by the College during fiscal 2000-2001, the Founders gave $6,662,253 or 86% of the total. The Annual Fund saw a record amount raised for direct budgetary support of $2,201,094. Founders gave $1,081,965—49% of the total.

This outstanding record of generosity allows the College to grow and prosper and become the institution we all want it to be. For instance, annual fund support over the past few years made available additional resources for student recruitment. The effort culminated in an entering student body this year of 1,026, the first time in the 225-year history of the College that enrollment has topped one thousand men.

If we can continue to increase annual fund and capital giving to the College, Hampden-Sydney will take its rightful place among the very finest liberal arts colleges in the nation. I join the entire Hampden-Sydney community in expressing my heartfelt thanks for your generosity. Together we can make our noble College great.

With all good wishes,

Sincerely,

William C. Boinest '54
Chairman of the Board

"As a high school student, I had no intention of coming to Hampden-Sydney, but once I visited, I immediately fell in love with the place. The small size and availability of leadership roles has allowed me to do things I never thought possible. I am forever grateful for the opportunities that the Macfarlane family and other alumni, trustees, and parents have afforded Hampden-Sydney men through their gifts to the College."

NICHOLAS D. BEAZLEY '03

The Granger & Anne Macfarlane Scholarship was established in 1986 by John G. III '76 and Dudley W. Macfarlane and named in honor of his parents. This fund is administered by the Honors Council as part of the College's Merit Awards. It is awarded to entering freshmen from Virginia, on the basis of outstanding leadership characteristics and superior academic achievement in their secondary-school careers. Preference is given to students from Roanoke and contiguous counties.

"Hampden-Sydney College provides an ideal environment in which students can grow and develop into confident young men and good citizens. The liberal arts curriculum develops perspective and an essential ability to reason, while the Honor Code stresses the importance of character and of acting responsibly. I was fortunate at Hampden-Sydney to have been the recipient of the merit-based Baker Scholarship. It provided the incentive for me to become serious about my study and to pursue graduate study, which I might not otherwise have considered. I view it as my duty, now that I am able, to give back to the institution which gave so much to me and, in the process, to have a similar impact on young men at Hampden-Sydney."

"Hampden-Sydney College was undoubtedly the right school for Johnny Mac. The special and intimate atmosphere of the rural campus, combined with the small student body, provided just the right combination to bring out the best in him, motivating him to excel and achieve on a high plane. As parents, we are extremely grateful for the fine education, leadership, and dedication to high principles which Hampden-Sydney offered our son. It gives us great pleasure to know that in future years, thanks to this scholarship endowment, qualified young men will receive a high-quality liberal arts education, coupled with the fine traditions of Hampden-Sydney."

Dr. and Mrs. Mayo with Caleb Varner '02, the 2000/2001 recipient of the Martha L. Mayo Scholarship.

"We have been associated with Hampden-Sydney College for almost forty years, and we are very fond of this place. During those years we have watched generations of students learn in classrooms as well as through their involvement in athletics, student government, and fraternities. We have seen them develop at this small, residential, liberal arts college, and we are delighted to support its mission."

JESSIE BALL DUPONT FUND

"The Jessie Ball duPont Fund believes deeply in the power of higher education, and particularly in the special role of small liberal arts colleges. American democratic society is absolutely dependent upon a well-educated citizenry, one that understands well its public responsibilities. The small college provides yeoman's work in this regard, and no one does it better than Hampden-Sydney College."

SHERRY P. MAGILL, PH.D.
President of The Jessie Ball duPont Fund.

The Jesse Ball duPont Memorial Scholarship, an endowed scholarship fund, was established in 1978 by a gift from the Jesse Ball duPont Fund of Jacksonville, Florida

"I applied to several small liberal arts schools, but really wanted to come to Hampden-Sydney College. It had so much—beautiful campus, rigorous academics, with the opportunity to pursue other interests like athletics and social activites. But all of that didn't mean much if I couldn't afford it. So my Allan Scholarship was what finally got me here."

"Whether through financial assistance or help with internships, job placement and campus programs, alumni and friends have been critically important to the success of the Wilson Center for Leadership in the Public Interest. Take away the support the Center receives from its alumni and friends, and the Wilson Center would be a pale reflection of the regionally, and even nationally, recognized organization that it has become in four short years. For its part, the Center serves alumni through a mix of programs and services that are offered in collaboration with other agencies of the College such as the alumni relations office and career services."

Your support of the Hampden-Sydney College unrestricted Annual Fund set a new record with $2.2 million, up more than 10% from last year's $2 million. We also brought in record dollars for endowment—over $4 million—and set a new record for total giving to Hampden-Sydney College at $7.7 million. For these accomplishments, all of us who have the privilege to labor daily on the Hill are immensely grateful. Your support, offered in so many ways, has been vital as we strive to maintain the central character of this place while responding to 21st-century challenges.

WALTER MICHAEL BORTZ III

ON THE FRONT COVER—WAYS THE ANNUAL FUND HELPED THE HAMPDEN-SYDNEY FAMILY DURING THE PAST YEAR
(Clockwise from top left): The soccer team is one of eight varsity sports, underwritten partially by annual giving. Unrestricted gifts help the library buy books as needed. Science lab equipment is expensive. The President and Institutional Advancement staff celebrate a record-breaking year. Freshmen test team-building skills during orientation. The Annual Fund subsidizes faculty salaries and research grants. Fine arts students took a play to Edinburgh during the summer. The football team continues to improve. Students and College family helped build a Habitat house on campus. The baseball field is among the sports center improvements. Student government officers were sworn in during Opening Convocation. The lacrosse team is nationally-ranked. Student leaders, such as these, are what Hampden-Sydney is all about.
